And the pictures are beyond question genuine. They carry a kind of intrinsic proof of themselves, and they are certified by circumstances and by the most learned men in pictures. And their interest is profound to every body who cares about the subject at all. Mr. Jarves does not claim that the pictures are the best specimens of the various masters, but that they are characteristic. He has collected the nucleus of a complete gallery. As finer pictures of any master or period are received, they may be introduced in their places; but the collection as it is offers the place: so that with Kugler, or Mr. Jarves's own "Art-Studies," now in press, and of especial reference to these works, the student can familiarize himself with the history of Italian art, "with its progressive illustration of Christian story and dogma, and with the peculiar merits of the most famous masters." Hitherto this was impossible. We have had good pictures and interesting galleries, but they were miscellaneous and incoherent. This Gallery is rich in the best Italian works, as well as others; but this is conscientious and exclusive in its Italian character.

Of course it is to be hoped that there always a loud call and a ready sale in Europe. But Mr. Jarves hopes that the interest in art in this country has sufficiently grown to justify his expectation that this Gallery will be retained in New York. If not, the pictures will cross the sea again and be sold. We are all interested that this should not happen, but that the collection should remain, and become the germ of a comprehensive metropolitan Gallery. Perhaps it is impossible that we should ever have at once the greater genius of the greatest old masters; but certainly we may have great and representative specimens of every country and time, so that we may see and study what the art has achieved. For instance, you may even in Venice larger and more famous pictures of Giorgione's, but you can nowhere see any work of his more luminous and gorgeous than one which Mr. Jarves has obtained.

This collection is placed in two of the new rooms of the Dusseldorf Gallery, where it may be seen with that. Its present home is an ex-cafe, and Cimabue, Margaritone of Arezzo, and Taddeo Gaddi in New York! Shall we be less hospitable than Italy? Shall we entertain these illustrious guests unawares?

TIME'S CHANGES.

WHOEVER remembers certain historic events at Boulogne and Strasbourg, must smile to see England and Russia each trying to secure the friendship, and already boasting of the amity of the hero of those towns. It is the same Louis Napoleon; he has been the tie to the two nations since those days, and has long since sailed into the port for which he was then blindly feeling. Every man knows that he is to-day the arbiter of Europe, so far as any man can be. But the movement is one of nations and sentiments, and any man, even Louis himself, if he seriously opposes it, will be swept away.

Why, then, did his Admiral invite the Sardinian Admiral to cease firing at Gaeta?

Probably to prevent the capture or personal injury of the holding corps Bonba. The Italian question should be settled with as little difficult complication as possible. But suppose Bonbalino were taken prisoner, inevitably a kind of party spirit is aroused for him, and his capture would have drawn on Victor Emanuel what could he do with him? If his government is so atrocious that the people rise and destroy it, when they had captured him they could not consistently let him go. What, then, should they do? They would not wish to take the extreme step of England with Charles First and Queen Anne's dames Scitcherie, even upon so higher ground than policy. They couldn't put him in prison comfortably themselves, for he would be the nucleus of fostering distractions in the State. If they exiled him, they give him a certain power. Assassinate him, Lat'hia, they will be himself. Let him run away like a thief in the night. Let him fly before the hatred of his people and the contempt of the world.

Why may not such considerations explain Louis Napoleon's action? Of course he wishes no unnecessary complication. He is reconstructing the monarchical system in Europe. Elected by the people, he wishes to see other kings resting upon the same right.

Does it ever occur to the Emperor of France that people can only elect a man and not a dynasty? We can not vote for our descendants. If we could transfer the sovereignty of the Republic to the children of the French to-day would illegitimate Louis Napoleon as womanly. Our agreement to have one man for our term is not to have that man transmit children to have an unborn man for their king when we of to-day are all gone. If L. N. reigns by the will of the people, he must have the same title.

Do you suppose he thinks of these things as he plays home at the garden with the little Prince? Do you suppose any man in Europe knows it more fully than he?

A STORY OF TWO GIANTS.

IF a poor man should put up a shanty in the Park, because he could not possibly pay any ground-rent, and, being there, should he be asked or permitted to remain? Would he be considered a miserable squatter, a vagabond, a lawless savage, and sent about his business with a kick and a curse? Undoubtedly he would; and the newspapers would make as much sport of him as they did of Brandy.

Well, now, suppose a millionaire puts up a pier upon the city dock along the river, because he chooses not to pay any rent, do you see any difference between the performance of the poor man in the Park and the rich man upon the water—except that one can not pay and the other can? What do you call appropriating what doesn't belong to you, and what you know doesn't belong to you? Is there any moral difference between taking the property of several thousand people and the property of one man?

Once upon a time there were two great big giants, and they said, "Pooh! pooh!" They came to a great city, and began to eat it up. The people looked aghast, but the giants said, "Pooh! pooh!" One day ate the great steamboat wharves and smacked their chaps. Then they ate the little steamboat routes, and the ferry rights, far and near, and waxed very fat, and cried, "Pooh! pooh!" Then one of the giants went and ate up a poor little country in Central America, with plenty of red gravy from men's veins: and he smiled pleasantly. Then the other of the giants went and tried to eat up a whole government: but either he swallowed a great piece of Legislature, something stuck in his throat, so that he couldn't swallow any more; and he coughed and coughed, and behold! a Governor that was too tough for the giant. So he grinned terribly, and cried, "Pooh! pooh!" Then he went and ate all round the two great big giants began to consume the city. One bit off one end of the Battery, and the other bit off the other end; and they met and had eaten that, they were going to eat up all the streets. Their jaws dripped and reeked with gravy, and they cried, "Pooh! pooh!" But one day the people suddenly answered their "pooh! pooh!" and cried, "Have! Have!" or perhaps it was "Have! Have!" Probably it was, because there were so many people who cried the same thing. And then the great big giants looked at the people, and said, definitely, "Pooh! pooh!" But the people said to them, "Pooh have you ever been so full that you could not eat of us? What do we owe to you, that you should take what belongs to us without paying us for it? Have you not been supported, admired, our admiration, or our love, that you should presume upon our consent to your pocketing our property, possessing it, in fact, without our consent? Have you not two great, big, voracious, insatiable giants?"

Then the two giants could only answer, "Pooh! pooh!" But the people took it up, and replied "Pooh! pooh!" so much, that the two giants shrunk, and withered, and disappeared. And over the grave of one was written, "Pooh!" and over that of the other, "Pooh!" And, in fact, dear, little children had better be so poor that they would like to have a giant to eat them, than to rather than be nothing but great big giants who only eat up railroads, and ferries, and streets, and the like. Then they are gone, have only "Pooh! pooh!" for an epitaph.

A GIFT.

THE "season of mists and mellow fruitfulness," of which Keats sings, is but the decorated antechamber to the most genial and gracious season of the whole year—the time of Thanksgiving and Christmas, and New Year. And these are all festivals of the heart. They are consecrated to sympathy, gratitude, and love, and the gifts which they are especially the season of gifts. For a gift is symbolic. Say a piece of love, and you have defined. When a lover adorns his mistress with diamonds, it is not carbon he gives her, but affection in a costly and beautiful form. And the gift of a book is not the thing given, but the feeling it expresses, which is the value of a gift. The cup of cold water which is given in kindness, is the best gift that can be given. Browning's "How they Brought the Good News from Aix to Ghent," Leigh Hunt's "Abou Ben Adhem," Byron's "Isles of Greece," Rogers's "Pleasures of Memory," Gray's "Elegy," Campbell's "Hohenlinden," Longfellow's "Psalm of Life," Halleck's "Marco Bozzaris," are all of that kind.

Now Dr. Polaner has for several years been thoughtfully selecting and compiling more than two hundred such poems, the most exquisite in the language. He has consulted personally with the survivors and the friends of the English poets. They have helped him in every way they could, and specially by contributing autograph copies of some of their most popular verses. These have been carefully engraved, and are a most delightful memorial of the poets and their art. In a brief, concise but artists, Kennett, Eastman Johnson, McLean, M. Donough, Church, Parsons, Boughton, Darley, Hicks, Hennessy, and others, have done the designs, and Houghton's Riverside press, at Cambridge, has done its share, in printing, so that the book is the most unique and exquisite and valuable gift-book ever produced in this country. The preface of the compiler of the work—who knows that he also has been the selection and authentication of the poems—is expressed with a dainty delicacy becoming the sentiments and subjects of the volume. He is a man of too much taste not to know and enjoy the delightfulness of his long labor; and public opinion will confirm the verdict of his own partial admiral pride in calling his "Folk-Songs" a perfect gift-book.

A QUESTION ANSWERED.

"DEAR MR. LOTHROP.—We are the midway of the Prince's Ball at the Academy of Music a presidential himself in the country of freedom and of democracy, and thing like aristocracy—a monarchical institution, a very artificial stand, and that of such slender nature as to give way under foot at the slightest movement.

"ONE OF THE PEOPLE."

Yes, it seems really so. But one of the people, like all the people, must not forget that democracy is in the spirit, not in the form. If the best man in the city could be found, he would be the best governor, and, if we were wise, we should make him perpetual and absolute dictator. The democratic spirit is precisely an effort to find the best man, and a confession that, since we can never tell whether we have found him or not, we must keep trying.

The real test is not any particular case.

But who, but Heaven, shall tell us who are?

The final argument for the democratic system is, that permanent power is proved to be too intoxicating; and that, in the evident inability to find the really best man for ruler, all the people must aid themselves what man they prefer.

The despotic rule of ten men or ten thousand or ten million is quite as bad as the despotism of one. It is worse, as a great wrong is a hundred times more formidable than the ordinary two-sided kind. There is safety in system, but only in people. And therefore it is that, if you can be sure of the heart and conscience of a man or a people, it makes little or no difference what the form of government may be. If Washington had been king, he would probably have governed us as well as he did under the name of President. But he had the wisdom to see that the chances were always against any individual's being wise enough as a good ruler. Crowwell may be a natural king. But Richard Crowwell?

The superiority of the democratic system is based upon the calculation of chances. So you see the most any government can do is to protect the utmost liberty of the individual which does not interfere with the equal liberty of any other. If Louis Napoleon is wise, he does all that the American system can do. If the American system fails to do that, it is just so far despotic.

A great deal is said about when no moral is recognized in society. Now we have gained so much as this that the laws do not recognize rank as they do in other countries. A servant girl, in Europe, can hardly walk through New York with his eyes and ears open without discovering that the feeling of rank prevails. It will never get further. The world may talk, but it will never turn round and go backward.

The Prince and his friends, and probably his friends more than the Prince, saw that our system is republican. They saw, that is, it constantly educates the people so that they are better prepared for the duties which pass to them due to a common sympathy. So it is throughout. Mr. Yancey was so far right when he said that the Union is dissolved the moment you try to coerce. It is so; for the Union coheres, and can cohere, only by mutual consent; and that consent will last so long as the general interest is answered; and the general interest will be promoted so long as the people are more and more just as well as more and more intelligent. "One of the people" will look to himself, the system of the government will take care of itself, and all false aristocracy and all arbitrary privilege will go where last year's fogs have gone.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE TRIO AT WARSAW.

WHEN Victor first began to reign
Warsaw was full of joy;
He much alarmed three mighty men
And yet of them but two were foes.
The first he was a Russian;
The next he was a Prussian;
And the third he was a little Kaiser;
Three Emperors altogether.

The Russian cheted with yearn;
The Prussian spun a yarn;
And the little Kaiser waxed red with wrath,
And all three Sovereigns warm.
The Russian was angry with self-will;
The Prussian made swollen his purse;
And the little Kaiser he grew fat with Kaiser-ness,
With his Charter under his arm.

ARROGANT AXIOM. BY A RICH MAN.

Poverty has no right to have any pride. The man who has not a thousand dollars should take better care not to be out-at-elbows!

It may be interesting to some of our fair readers to learn that the most correct style of costume in fashion in the time of Henry IV., and that it was thought no more to have been made so by the Duke of Buckingham, who, in a civil war, set his artists, Kennett, Eastman Johnson, McLean, M. Donough, Church, Parsons, Boughton, Darley, Hicks, Hennessy, and others, have done the designs, and Houghton's Riverside press, at Cambridge, has done its share, in printing, so that the book is the most unique and exquisite and valuable gift-book ever produced in this country. The preface of the compiler of the work—who knows that he also has been the selection and authentication of the poems—is expressed with a dainty delicacy becoming the sentiments and subjects of the volume. He is a man of too much taste not to know and enjoy the delightfulness of his long labor; and public opinion will confirm the verdict of his own partial admiral pride in calling his "Folk-Songs" a perfect gift-book.

Whenever undertaker to put a face on the mourning is one to get dozed in the long-run. Rain only, while silk by the drops of water, and sprinkling the white, as the evils of rain-drinking, a tiger Silver cried out, "If thinking you are sorry, why don't you look sorry?" Like strips, Pal quit it to-day."—"Very good," replied the stripsolier, "I am not sorry between your lying and mine is this—my strips enable me to be in a good warm bed, while your business of lies keeps you out."

Every man must of necessity have a master, and so you had better be your own.

It is supposed the fellow who left the house was not able to take it with him.

To Daniel Purcell, the eminent musical composer and actor, the following pun-ic epitaph was attributed by the late witty author of Joe Miller: "Dr. Arnold, and two or three more gallants of the day, having entertained Humphrey at a supper, were met by the famous Daniel Purcell, the quaker, who, as they were making merry, upon the score of the account they were going thither. The doctor merrily answered him, 'Dr. Purcell!'—'Very well,' replied the other, 'you'll be there at a very convenient season, the merry month of May.' The same gentleman calling for some pipes in a tavern, complained that they were too short. The drawer said they had no other, and these were the pi-ti ones in. 'Ay,' said Daniel, 'I see your master has not bought them very long.' The same gentleman, as he had the character of a great punster, was desired one night by some company to make a punning epitaph. Upon which Daniel immediately answered the above:—'Oh, Sir,' said he, 'that's very short and long.'"

Thousands who dread to have the word "death" in their mouths are continually taking the means of death into those thirsty orifices.

WHAT TURNS THE HAIR GRAY.

A lady who, though in the autumn of life, had lost all dreams of love or spring, said to Douglas Jerrold,

"I can not imagine what makes my hair turn so gray; I sometimes think it is the essence of rosemary with which my maid brushes it. What do you think?"

"I should rather be afraid, Madam," replied the distinguished dramatist, dryly, "that it is the essence of time!"

A young apprentice to the shoemaking business asked his master what answer he should give to the often-repeated question, "Does your master warrant his shoes?"—"Answer, Certainly," said the master, "that I warrant them to prove good; and, if they don't, I'll make them good for nothing."

An Irishman tells us of a fight in which there was only one whole nose left in the crowd, "and that belonged to the referee."

Women who sue for breach of promise may fail to get money, but they generally receive heavy damages.

There was an old farmer who kept a large poultry-yard, and had one son who, not content with his proper sphere of action, was continually endeavoring to crow. At last, after repeated failures, the unsuccessful youth determined to emigrate. Then the old man was taking his breakfast at the time, and hearing the noise of packing went out, and discovered the object of the movement. He soon returned, bearing in his hand the crowing bantam, and said to his son, "I told ye, Tim, you'd be unable to crow much out any thing, but I s'pose you think you could crow. Cocks are very cheap over in Tipp'rary, but hens shall not; it's eating a bad example."

A man crosses himself for marrying by saying that his wife has been a widow so much for a relation.

Boasting is sometimes out of place. We were once amused at hearing a gentleman remark that he was a bachelor, or was his father before him.

A gentleman, who had been victimized by a notorious borrower, who always forgot to pay, called him one of the most prominent of his acquaintance.

"Sam," said a late minister of Drumblade to his man-of-all-work, "I'm afraid you're getting very shaky this forenoon; but as the vapor from the whisky may be dissipated by the glare of a bright sermon, I'm going to preach twice." Sam, as Samuel was an old soldier, answered very promptly, "Ay, ay, sir," and away he went; and having received from his master a special license to taste, went to work most heartily. Before the forenoon service the minister visited the cellar to inspect progress, and was horrified to find Sam lying his full length on the floor, completely overcome by the fumes. "Is that the minister, "you have not taken my advice, and you will be unable to preach." Sam, sun, and looking up, said, "I may rather you." Sam, nothing loth, took the glass from the minister's hand, and answered it each, "Now, sir, I'm ready." This is the thirteenth glass I've taken, but I'm me better."

Wealth does not always improve us. A man, as he gets rich, is apt to become more worthless.

The following is a copy of an advertisement which appeared in a country paper: "Made their escape, a blind bull's eyebrows. They disappeared immediately on escaping his wife for hands and face somewhat at breakfast."

A farmer who occasionally accommodated a neighbor with a ditch of lances at the killing season, being applied to as usual, replied, "I should be willing up my ditch whether I shall kill myself this year or take a dose of my father."

"Could you," said a young lady teacher, "after what I have been reading you, forgive your enemy?" That is, could you forgive another boy if he struck you?

"Why, yes," said the little rustic, doubling his fists, "if he was a good deal bigger than I am."

INTERESTING QUERY.

INTELLIGENT JUVENILE.—Ma, do we cut our second teeth altogether like we do one?

Ma.—"One by one; they come gradually, dear. I like you to ask questions, Intelligent Juvenile. Your mother is a bad subject."

INTELLIGENT JUVENILE.—Because, on last Sunday you had not a tooth in your head, and next day you had a full set of false teeth. Now what time does cut his all at once?

Ma does not answer, but gives the Intelligent child some pence, and tells him not to ask such foolish questions again.

Many persons have a particular ambition to seem exactly what they are not. We know a man who bought a splendid library, and signed the contract with a cross.

A school-boy being asked to define the word "admission," said it meant "a thing to sell." "Stop-no!" said the schoolmaster: "what sort of a definition do you call that?" "I don't know," replied he boy, "but I'm sure there's a spy on the bill at the door in the fair." "Yes," said another boy, "and it's called a half-penny."

Ain't it curious, Squire, wouldn't it never out of women's heads? They're never think of nothin' else. A young gal is always thinkin' of a husband. As soon as she's married she is match-makin' for her companion; and when she is a grain older she always wouldn't be single for 'em. Oh, it takes a great study to know a woman! She cunning as the devil. She always ready to deceive you. She always ready to take you in. She always ready to make you believe she herself deceived. She ain't an old woman, she still a child. She ain't for strangers, to make you believe 'em; but in interest in the world that she ain't. They certainly the best ally, the worst foe.

CHARLES DICKENS, ESQ.—[FROM A LATE PHOTOGRAPH.]

CHARLES DICKENS.

We accompany the first part of Mr. Dickens's new novel, "GREAT EXPECTATIONS," with a Portrait of the author, taken from a very recent photograph. Those who remember him during his visit to this country will notice the change which has taken place since then in his outward man.

Mr. Dickens was born at Portsmouth, England, on 7th February, 1812. His father was for many years a Paymaster in the British Navy; on his retirement he became a reporter on the London press, and it was through him that Mr. Dickens first connected himself with journalism. His father's idea was that he should be an attorney; but a few months' work in a London office satisfied any longings he may have had for distinction in that profession. Abandoning the law, he became a reporter on the Sun, and afterward on the Morning Chronicle; studied short-hand assiduously, and for some years had had his seat in the Reporters' Gallery in the House of Commons.

It was during his arduous apprenticeship to the work of a Parliamentary reporter that he wrote his first sketch of life, under the pseudonyme of Boz. It pleased, and was followed by others, which attracted so much attention by their keen humor, pathos, and remarkable discernment of character, that their author was offered a handsome sum by Mr. Hall, of Chapman & Hall, to write them a series of sketches, to be published with illustrations in monthly parts. This was the origin of the famous "Pickwick Papers," the first number of which was published in 1835. Their success was almost unprecedented. When the first number appeared Mr. Dickens was unknown; when the work was completed he was the most popular writer in England; and Pickwick, Bardell, and the Wellers were familiar to every body. No writer of modern times has jumped as suddenly to fame as Mr. Dickens.

In 1837 "Oliver Twist" followed, and was eagerly welcomed on both sides the Atlantic; and in 1839 "Nicholas Nickleby" fully maintained the reputation of its author. "Master Humphrey's Clock," which followed in 1840 and 1841, was not, perhaps, as widely popular, though many consider little Nell the most graceful and perfect of Mr. Dickens's creations.

In 1842 Mr. Dickens visited this country, and was received with an enthusiasm which the appearance of "American Notes" had a tendency to dampen. On his return home he published the first and sweetest of his Christmas stories—"A Christmas Carol," and "Martin Chuzzlewit"—a work of infinite power, and full of his peculiar humor, but marred by the faults which were so conspicuous in his previous work on America.

In 1846 Mr. Dickens appeared before the public as the editor of a daily newspaper—the Daily News—which was intended to inaugurate a new era in London journalism. He had previously filled, for a few months, the office of editor of Bentley's Miscellany, but this was his first experiment in political journalism. It is no discredit to him that it was not a success. His peculiar powers are very different from, perhaps superior to, those required of the editor of a daily paper. After a few months of severe labor he resigned his post, and reinstated himself in public favor by the publication of those most charming of tales, "Dombey & Son" and "David Copperfield."

In 1850 he established, in conjunction with Messrs. Bradbury and Evans, a new paper, under the title of Household Words, and published in its pages, successively, his "Child's History of England" and "Hard Times." It attained a very wide popularity, and became, as its founder intended, a household favorite throughout England. Mr. Dickens did not publish in its columns, however, "Bleak House" or "Little Dorrit," both of which appeared in monthly parts.

In 1850, owing to a difference between Mr. Dickens and Messrs. Bradbury and Evans, Household Words was discontinued, and Mr. Dickens established a new periodical, All the Year Round, in which he gave to the world his last serial, "A Tale of Two Cities." By a special arrangement with Mr. Dickens, the proof-sheets of All the Year are dispatched to the publishers of Harper's Weekly some time before they are published in England, and thus the readers of this journal enjoy the benefit of every thing that appears in Mr. Dickens's periodical a fortnight or more before the regular copies reach this country. The new novel, "Great Expectations," has, we are told, aroused great expectation on the other side. Our subscribers will have the advantage of reading it by the light of Mr. McLenan's admirable illustrations.

Mr. Dickens has written so much and so well that the severest ordeal any thing new that he writes has to undergo is the comparison with what he has written before. His published stories are so popular that people will hardly admit that they can be equaled; the admirers of Dombey and Copperfield were quite jealous of Little Dorrit, and affected to speak lightly of Doctor Manette. It is not uncommon to hear people say that he has written himself out. It may be remarked, however, that while the contemporaries of the Pickwick Papers deny that he has ever surpassed that work, there are numerous critics who consider "Oliver Twist" his master-piece, others who prefer "Nicholby," none who pronounce in favor of the "Old Curiosity Shop," and others in favor of "Dombey & Son;" while, judging from the sales of the published volumes, "Little Dorrit" has the best claim to preeminence; and from the actual number of readers, the "Tale of Two Cities" would probably hold the first rank. In a word, there is not the least reason for supposing that in any of the qualities which have raised Mr. Dickens to his present fame—humor, descriptive power, analytical perception of character, charm of style, fancy, pathos, or dramatic ability—there has been any decay since Boz first came before the public. We have no doubt that "Great Expectations" will have as many admirers as any of its predecessors, and that a new generation of readers will decide, when it is ended, that the Great Novelist has at last written his great work—leaving it to their children, or, at all events, to their successors in the reading world, to discover that, after all, the real master-piece was yet to come, and that a genius like that of Dickens is inexhaustible.

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

Splendidly Illustrated by John McLenan.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased from the Author by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER I

MY father's family name being Pirrip, and my Christian name Philip, my infant tongue could make of both names nothing longer or more explicit than Pip. So I called myself Pip, and came to be called Pip.

I give Pirrip as my father's family name, on the authority of his tombstone and my sister—Mrs. Joe Gargery, who married the blacksmith. As I never saw my father or my mother, and never saw any likeness of either of them (for their days were long before the days of photographs), my first fancies regarding what they were like were unreasonably derived from their tombstones. The shape of the letters on my father's, gave me an odd idea that he was a square, stout, dark man with curly black hair. From the character and turn of the inscription, "Also Georgiana wife of the above," I drew a childish conclusion that my mother was freckled and sickly. To five little stone lozenges, each about a foot and a half long, which were arranged in a neat row beside their grave, and were sacred to the memory of five little brothers of mine—who gave up trying to get a living exceedingly early in that universal struggle—I am indebted for a belief I religiously entertained that they had all been born on their backs with their hands in their trowsers-pockets, and had never taken them out in this state of existence.

Ours was the marsh country, down by the river, within, as the river wound, twenty miles of the sea. My first distinct impression of the identity of things seems to me to have been gained on a memorable raw, dark, gusty afternoon toward evening. At such a time I found out for certain that this bleak place overgrown with nettles was the church-yard; and that Tobias Pirrip, late of this parish, and also Georgiana, wife of the above, were dead and buried; and that Alexander, Bartholomew, Abraham, George, and Robert, infant children of the aforesaid, were also dead and buried; and that the dark, flat wilderness beyond the church-yard, intersected with dikes and mounds and gates, with scattered cattle feeding on it, was the marshes; and that the low leaden line beyond was the river; and that the distant savage lair from which the wind was raging, was the sea; and that the small bundle of shivers growing afraid of it all and beginning to cry, was Pip.

"Hold your noise!" cried a terrible voice, as a man started up from among the graves at the side of the church-porch. "Hold your noise, you little devil, or I'll cut your throat!"

A fearful man, all in gray, with a great iron on his leg. A man with no hat, and broken shoes, and with an old rag tied round his head. A man who had been soaked in water and smothered in mud, and lamed by stones, and cut by flints, and stung by nettles, and torn by briers; who limped, and shivered, and glared, and growled; and whose teeth chattered in his head as he seized me by the chin.

"Don't cut my throat, Sir!" I pleaded in terror. "Pray don't do it, Sir!"

"Tell us your name!" said the man. "Quick!"

"Pip, Sir."

"Once more," said the man. "Give it mouth!"

"Pip. Pip, Sir."

"Show us where you live," said the man. "Pint out the place!"

I pointed to where our village lay on the flat in-shore among the alder-trees and pollards, a mile or more from the church.

The man, after looking at me for a moment, turned me upside-down, and emptied my pockets. There was nothing in them but a piece of bread. When the church came to itself—for he was so sudden and strong that he made it go head over heels before me, and I saw the steeple under my legs—when the church came to itself, I say, I was seated on a high tombstone trembling, while he ate the bread ravenously.

"You young dog!" said the man, licking his lips at me. "What fat cheeks you ha' got!"

I believe they were fat, though I was at that time undersized for my years, and not strong.

I remembered that I couldn't eat 'em, and the man, with a threatening shake of his head, "and if I hain't half a mind to't!"

I earnestly expressed my hope that he wouldn't, and held tighter to the tombstone on which he had put me; partly to keep myself upon it, partly to keep myself from crying.

"Now then, lookee here!" said the man. "Where's your mother?"

"There, Sir!" said I.

He started, made a short run, and stopped and looked over his shoulder.

"There, Sir!" I timidly explained. "Also Georgiana. That's my mother."

"Oh!" said he, coming back. "And is that your father alongside your mother?"

"Yes, Sir," said I; "him too; late of this parish."

"Ha!" he muttered then, considering. "Who d'ye live with—supposin' you're kindly let to live, which I han't made up my mind about?"

"My sister, Mrs. Joe Gargery—wife of Joe Gargery, the blacksmith, Sir."

"Blacksmith, eh?" said he. And looked down at his leg.

After darkly looking at his leg and at me several times, he came closer to my tombstone, took me by both arms, and tilted me back as far as he could hold me; so that his eyes looked most powerfully down into mine, and mine looked most helplessly up into his.

"Now lookee here," he said, "the question being whether you're to be let to live. You know what a file is?"

"Yes, Sir."

"And you know what wittles is?"

"Yes, Sir."

After each question he tilted me over a little more, so as to give me a greater sense of helplessness and danger.

"You get me a file." He tilted me again. "And you get me wittles." He tilted me again. "You bring 'em both to me." He tilted me again. "Or I'll have your heart and liver out." He tilted me again.

I was dreadfully frightened, and so giddy that I clung to him with both hands, and said, "If you would kindly please to let me keep upright. Sir, perhaps I shouldn't be sick, and perhaps I could attend more."

He gave me a most tremendous dip and roll, so that the church jumped over its own weather-cock. Then he held me by the arms, in an upright position on the top of the stone, and went on in these fearful terms:

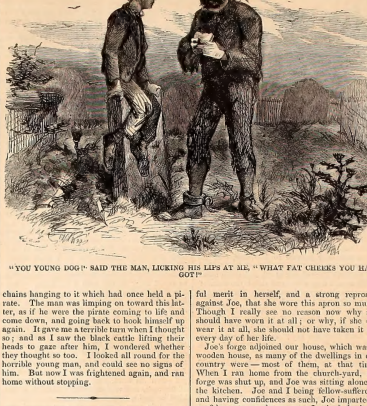
"You bring me, to-morrow morning early, that file, and them wittles. You bring the lot to me at that old Battery over yonder. You do this, and you never dare to say a word or dare to make a sign concerning your having seen such a person as me, or any person, and you shall be let to live. You fail, or you go from my words in any partickler, no matter how small the partickler, and your heart and your liver shall be tore out, roasted, and ate. Now I sim'late alone, as you may think I am. There's a young man hid with me, in comparion with which young man I am a Angel o' light. That young man hears the words I speak. That young man has a secret way peculiar to himself, of getting at a boy, and at his heart, and at his liver. It is in vain for a boy to attempt to hide himself from that young man. A boy may lock his door, may be warm in bed, may tuck himself up, may draw the clothes over his head, may think himself comfortable and safe; but that young man will softly creep and creep his way to him and tear him open. I am a keepin' that young man from harmin' of you at the present moment, with great difficulty. I find it very hard to hold that young man off of your inside. Now, what do you say?"

I said that I would get him the file, and I would get him what broken bits of food I could, and I would come to him at the Battery, early in the morning.

"Say Lord strike you dead if you don't!" said the man.

I said so, and he took me down.

"Now," he pursued, "you remember what you've undertook, and you remember that young man, and you got none!"



"Goo-good-night, Sir," I faltered.

"Much of that!" said he, glancing about him over the cold wet flat. "I wish I was a frog. Or a eel!"

At the same time he hugged his shuddering body in both his arms—clasping himself, as if to hold himself together—and limped toward the low church wall. As I saw him go, picking his way among the nettles, and among the brambles that bound the evergreen mounds, he looked in my young eyes, as if he were eluding the hands of the dead people, stretching up cautiously out of their graves, to get a twist upon his ankle and pull him in.

When he came to the low church wall, he got over it, like a man whose legs were numbed and stiff, and then turned round to look for me. When I saw him turning, I set my face toward home, and made the best use of my legs. But presently I looked over my shoulder, and saw him going on again toward the river, still hugging himself in both arms, and picking his way with his sore feet among the great stones dropped into the marshes here and there, for stepping-places when the rains were heavy, or the tide was in.

The marshes were just a long black horizontal line then, as I stopped to look after him; and the river was just another horizontal line, not nearly so broad nor yet so black; and the sky was just a row of long angry red lines, and dense black lines intermixed. On the edge of the river I could faintly make out the only two black things in all the prospect that seemed to be standing upright; one of these was the beacon by which the sailors steered—like an unhooped cask upon a pole—an ugly slimy thing when you were near it; the other, a gibbet with some chains hanging to it which had once held a pirate. The man was limping on toward this latter, as if he were the pirate coming to life and come down, and going back to hook himself up again. It gave me a terrible turn when I thought so; and as I saw the black cattle lifting their heads to gaze after him, I wondered whether they thought so too. I looked all round for the horrible young man, and could see no signs of him. But now I was frightened again, and ran home without stopping.

"YOU YOUNG DOG" SAID THE MAN, LICKING HIS LIPS AT ME, "WHAT FAT CHEEKS YOU HA' GOT!"

CHAPTER II.

MY sister, Mrs. Joe Gargery, was more than twenty years older than I, and had established a great reputation with herself and the neighbors because she had brought me up "by hand." Having at that time to find out for myself what the expression meant, and knowing her to have a hard and heavy hand, and to be much in the habit of laying it upon her husband, as well as upon me, I supposed that Joe Gargery and I were both brought up by hand.

She was not a good-looking woman, my sister; and I had a general impression that she must have made Joe Gargery marry her by hand. Joe was a fair man, with curls of flaxen hair on each side of his smooth face, and eyes of such a very undecided blue that they seemed to have somehow got mixed with their own whites. He was a mild, good-natured, sweet-tempered, easy-going, foolish, dear fellow—a sort of Hercules in strength, and also in weakness.

My sister, Mrs. Joe, with black hair and eyes, had such a prevailing redness of skin that I sometimes used to wonder whether it was possible she washed herself with a nutmeg-grater instead of soap. She was tall and bony, and always wore a coarse apron, fastened over her figure behind with two loops, and having a square, impregnable bit in front that was stuck full of pins and needles. She made it a powerful merit in herself, and a strong reproach against Joe, that she wore this apron so much. Though I really see no reason now why she should have worn it at all; or why, if she did wear it at all, she should not have taken it off every day of her life.

Joe's forge adjoined our house, which was a wooden house, as many of the dwellings in our country were—most, of them, at that time. When I ran home from the church-yard, the forge was shut up, and Joe was sitting alone in the kitchen. Joe and I being fellow-sufferers, and having confidences as such, Joe imparted a confidence to me the moment I raised the latch of the door and peeped in at him opposite to it, sitting in the chimney-corner.

"Mrs. Joe has been out a dozen times, looking for you, Pip; and she's out now, making it a baker's dozen."

"Is she?"

"Yes, Pip," said Joe; "and what's worse, she's got Tickler with her."

At this dismal intelligence I twisted the only button on my waistcoat round and round, and looked in great depression at the fire. Tickler was a wax-ended piece of cane, worn smooth by collision with my tickled frame.

"She sot down," said Joe, "and she got up, and she made a grab at Tickler, and she rampaged out. That's what she did," said Joe, slowly clenching the fire between the bars with the poker: "she ram-paged out, Pip."

"Has she been gone long, Joe?" I always treated him as a larger species of child, and as no more than my equal.

"Well," said Joe, looking up at the Dutch clock, "she's been on the Ram-page, this last spell, about five minutes, Pip. She's a coming! Get behind the door, old chap, and have the jack-towel betwixt you."

I took the advice. My sister, Mrs. Joe, throwing the door wide open, and finding no obstruction behind it, immediately divined the cause, and applied Tickler to further investigation. She concluded by showing me. I often served her as a connubial missile at Joe, who, glad to get hold of me on any terms, passed me on into the chimney and quietly fenced me there with his great legs.

"Where have you been, you young monkey?" said Mrs. Joe, stamping her foot. "Tell me directly what you've been doing to wear me away with fret and fright and worrit, or I'll have you out of that corner if you was fifty Pips and he was five hundred Gargerys."

"I have only been to the church-yard," said I, from my stool, crying and rubbing myself.

"Church-yard!" repeated my sister. "If it warn't for me you'd have been to the church-yard long ago, and staid there. Who brought you up by hand?"

"You did," said I.

"And why did I do it, I should like to know!" exclaimed my sister.

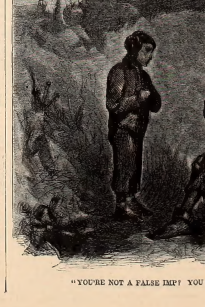
I whimpered, "I don't know."

"I don't!" said my sister. "I'd never do it again! I know that. I may truly say I've never had this apron of mine off since born you were. It's bad enough to be a blacksmith's wife (and him a Gargery), without being your mother."

My thoughts strayed from that question as I looked disconsolately at the fire. For the fugitive out on the marshes with the ironed leg, the mysterious young man, the file, the victuals, and the dreadful pledge I was under to commit a larceny on those sheltering premises, rose before me in the avenging coals.

"Hah!" said Mrs. Joe, restoring Tickler to his station. "Church-yard, indeed! You may well say church-yard, you two." One of us, by-the-by, had not said it at all. "You'll drive me to the church-yard betwixt you one of these days, and oh, a pr-r-recious pair you'd be without me!"

As she applied herself to set the tea-things, Joe peeped down at me over his leg, as if he were mentally casting me and himself up, and I calculating what kind of pair we practically should make, under the grievous circumstances foreshadowed. After that, he sat feeling his right-side flaxen curls and whisker, and following Mrs. Joe about with his blue eyes, as his manner always was at spually times.



My sister had a trenchant way of cutting our bread-and-butter for us, that never varied. First, with her left hand she held the loaf, hard and fast, against her bib—where it sometimes got a pin into it, and sometimes a needle, which we afterward got into our mouths. Then she took some butter (not too much) on a knife and spread it on the loaf in an apothecary kind of way, as if she were making a plaster—using both sides of the knife with a slapping dexterity, and trimming and moulding the butter off round the crust. Then she gave the knife a final smart wipe on the edge of the plaster, and then sawed a very thick round off the loaf, which she finally, before separating from the loaf, hewed into two halves: of which Joe got one, and I the other.

On the present occasion, though I was hungry, I dared not eat my slice. I felt that I must have something in reserve for my dreadful acquaintance and his ally, the still more dreadful young man. I knew Mrs. Joe's housekeeping to be of the strictest kind, and that my larvenous researches in the dead of night might find nothing available in the safe, therefore I resolved to put my hunk of bread-and-butter down the leg of my trowsers.

The effort of resolution necessary to the achievement of this purpose I found to be quite awful. It was as if I had to make up my mind to leap from the top of a high house, or plunge into a great depth of water. And it was made the more difficult by the unconscious Joe. In our above-mentioned freemasonry as fellow-sufferers, and in his good-natured companionship with me, it was our evening habit to compare the way we bit through our slices by silently holding them up to each other's admiration now and then—which in general led us to new exertions. To-night Joe several times invited me by the dignity of his fast-diminishing slice, to enter upon our usual friendly competition; but he found me each time with my yellow mug of tea on one knee, and my untouched bread-and-butter on the other. At last, I desperately considered that the time I contemplated must be done, and that it had best be done in the least improbable manner consistent with the circumstances. I took advantage of a moment when Joe had just looked aside, and got my bread-and-butter into my lap.

"PIP, OLD CHAP! YOU'LL DO YOURSELF A MISCHIEF. IT'LL STICK SOMEWHERE. YOU CAN'T HAVE CRAWED IT, PIP."

"YOU'RE NOT A FALSE IMP! YOU BROUGHT NO ONE WITH YOU!"

Joe was evidently made uncomfortable by what he supposed to be my loss of appetite, and was a thoughtful and particular bite out of his slice, which he didn't seem to enjoy. He rolled it about in his mouth much longer than usual, pondering over it a good deal, and after all gulped it down like a pill. He was about to take another bite, and had got his head on one side for a good purchase on it, when his eye fell on me, and he saw that my bread-and-butter was gone.

The wonder and consternation with which Joe stopped on the threshold of his bite and stared at me were too evident to escape my sister's observation.

"What's the matter now?" said she, smartly, as she put down her cup.

"I say, you know!" muttered Joe, shaking his head at me in very serious remonstrance. "Pip, old chap! You'll do yourself a mischief. I'll stick somewhere. You can't have chawed it, Pip."

"What's the matter now?" repeated my sister, more sharply than before.

"If you can cough any trifle on it up, Pip, I'd recommend you to do it," said Joe, all solicitude. "Don't choke (supposing, but still you'll with your cith."

By this time my sister was quite desperate, so she pounced on Joe, and, taking him by the two whiskers, knocked his head for a little while against the wall behind him: while I sat in the corner, looking guiltily on.

"Now, perhaps, you'll mention what's the matter," said my sister, out of breath, and still staring great stuck pig.

Joe looked at her in a helpless way; then took a hitch in his trousers, and looked at me again.

"You know, Pip," said Joe, solemnly, with his left hand in his pocket, and speaking as if he were addressing a third party, as if we were quite alone, "you and me is always friends, and I'd be the last to tell upon you at any time. But what has moved his chair and looked about the floor between us, and then again at me—" such a horrid common fit, Pip?"

"Been boiling his food, has he?" cried my sister.

"You know, old chap," said Joe, looking at me, and not Mrs. Joe, with his bite still in his cheek, "I'm partial myself, when I've a cold on—frequent—and as to you I've been among a many Boilers; but I never see your equal yet, Pip, and it's my opinion you ain't eldorado."

My sister made a dive at me, and fished me up by the hair: saying nothing more explicit than "Artful wretch," as she combed me down.

Some medical beast had revived Tar-water in those days as a fine medicine, and Mrs. Joe always kept a supply of it in the cupboard; having a belief in its virtues correspondent to its horrible nastiness. At the best of times a teacupful of this elixir was administered to me as a choice restorative, that I was conscious of going about, smelling like a new fence. On the present occasion, on account of my case demanded a pint of tar-water, which was poured down my throat, for my greater comfort, while Mrs. Joe held my head under her arm as a boot would be held in a bootjack. Joe got off with half a pint; but was made to take that (much to his disturbance, as he sat slowly biting and meditating before the fire) "because he had a turn. Judging from myself, I should say he certainly had one afterward, if he had had none before.

Conscience is a dreadful thing when it accuses a man on the subject of pork, in the case of that secret burden co-operates with another secret burden down the leg of his trousers, it often leads to results most painful. The physical knowledge that I was going to rob Mrs. Joe—I never thought I was going to rob Joe, for I had a hazy thought of any of the housekeeping property as his—united to the necessity of always keeping one hand out of the bread-and-butter of Joe when I was ordered about the kitchen on any small errand, almost drove me out of my mind. Then, as the marsh winds made the fire flare and flare, I thought I heard the fierce voice outside of the man who had sworn me to secrecy, and sworn me to secrecy, declaring that he couldn't and wouldn't starve until to-morrow, but must be fed then. At other times, I thought, What if the young man who was with so much difficulty restrained from imbruing his hands in me, should either get free by his constitutional implacability, should mistake the time, and should think himself accredited to my heart and mercy by the pastime of to-morrow? If ever any body's hair stood on end with terror, mine must have done so then. But, perhaps, nobody's ever did.

It was Christmas Eve, and I had to stir the pudding for next day, with the copper-stick, from seven to eight by the Dutch clock. I tried it with the lead upon my leg (and that made me think afresh of the man with the iron on his leg), and found the tendency of exercise to bring the bread-and-butter out at my ankle, quite unmanageable and unconquerable. Happily I slipped away, and deposited that part of my conscience in my garret bedroom.

"Hark!" said I, when I had done my stirring, and was taking a final warm in the chimney-corner before being sent up to bed; "was that guns, Joe?"

"Ah!" said Joe. "There was a fresh convict off."

"What does that mean, Joe?" said I.

Mrs. Joe, who always set explanations upon herself, said, snappishly, "Escaped. Escaped." Administering the definition like Tar-water.

While Mrs. Joe sat with her head bending over her needle-work, I put my mouth into the forms of saying to Joe, "What's a convict?" Joe put his mouth into the forms of answering such a highly elaborate answer, that I could make out nothing of it but the single word "Pip."

"There was one off last night," said Joe, aloud, "after supper-time, and the Lord help him, may he not be taken, I say, for I don't like the looks of the weather. It's a fine night for escaping in. And now, I'll tell you what, Pip, I'd recommend you to do it," said Joe, all explanation in his manner, but still very much with your cith."

By this time my sister was quite desperate, so she pounced on Joe, and, taking him by the two whiskers, knocked his head for a little while against the wall behind him: while I sat in the corner, looking guiltily on.

"Hark!" said I, when I had done my stirring, the pie, and I took it in the hope that it was not intended for early tea, and would not be missed for some time.

There was a door in the kitchen communicating with the forge; I unlocked and unbolted that door, and got a file from among Joe's tools. Then I put the fastenings as I had found them, opened the door at which I had entered when I ran home last night, shut it, and ran for the misty marshes.

CHAPTER III.

It was a rimy morning, and very damp. I had seen the damp lying out on the outside of my little window, as if some goblin had been crying there all night, and using the window for his pocket-handkerchief. Now I saw the damp lying on the bare hedges and spare grass, like a coarser sort of spiders' webs; hanging itself from twig to twig and blade to blade. Everyleaf and gate wet lay clammy; and the marsh mist was so thick that the wooden finger on the post, directing people to our village—a direction which they never accepted, for they never came there—was invisible to me until I was quite close under it. Then, as I looked up at it, while it dripped, it seemed to my oppressed conscience like a phantom devoting me to the Hulks.

The mist was heavier yet when I got out upon the marshes, so that, instead of my running at every thing, every thing seemed to run at me. This was very disagreeable to a guilty mind. The gates and dikes and banks came bursting at me through the mist, as if they cried as plainly as could be, "A boy with a pie stolen! Stop him!" The cattle stood looking at me, with their heads down and their breath coming out of their nostrils, "Holloa, young thief!" One black ox, with a white cravat on—who has a special right bestowed upon him to toss every boy he sees, and consequently something of a clerical air—fixed me so steadily with his eyes, and moved his blunt head round in such an accusatory manner as I moved round, that I called out to him, "I couldn't help it, I wouldn't for myself, sir!" Upon which his pious sentiments appeared to choke him, for he put down his head, blew a cloud of smoke out of his nose, and vanished with a kick-up of his hind legs and a flourish of his tail.

All this time I was getting on toward the river; but however fast I went, I couldn't warm my feet, for they seemed to be cold themselves, and as the iron was riveted to the leg of the man I was running to meet. I knew my way to the Buttery among the rushes, for I had been down there on a Sunday with Joe, and Joe had, sitting on an old stump in the middle of the river, twice to him regularly bowled, and sometimes have such Larks there as should recompense us for our consuming time. However, in the confusion of the mist, I found myself at last too far to the right, and consequently had to try back along the river-side, on the bank of loose stones above the mud and the stakes that staked the tide out, to come at the Buttery. Making my way in this new direction at a run, I was just crossed a ditch which I knew to be very near the Buttery, when I met scrambled up the mound beyond the ditch, when I saw the man sitting before me. His back was toward me, his legs were in ditch, his arms folded, and was nodding forward, heavy with sleep.

I thought he would be more glad if I came upon him while he was unconscious in that unexpected manner, so I went forward softly and touched him on the back. He instantly started up, and it was not the man, but another man!

And yet he was dressed in coarse gray, too, and had a pair of such fetters on his legs, and was lame, and hoarse, and cold, and was every thing that the other man was; except that he had not the same face, and had a beard, broad-brimmed, lowcrowned felt hat on. All this I saw in a moment, for I had only a moment to see it in; for when he found himself free, a bit at me—he was a round weak blow that missed me and almost knocked himself down, for it made him stumble—and then he ran into the mist, tumbling twice as he went, and I lost him.

"The time's up, master," I thought. I felt my heart shoot as I identified him; and I dare say I should have felt a pain in my liver, too, if I had known where to look for it.

I was soon at the Buttery after that, and there I met the sentry posted sentinel at sighting to and fro, as if he had never all night left off hugging and limping—waiting for me. He was very hungry, but looked half expected to see him drop down before my face and die of cold. His eyes looked so awfully hungry, too, that when I had unlocked the door it occurred to me he would have tried to eat it, if he had not seen my pie inside. He didn't turn me upside down, this time, to get at what I had, but left me right side upward while I opened the bundle and emptied my pockets.

"What's in the bottle, boy?" said he.

"Brandy," said I.

He was already handing mince-meat down his throat in the most curious manner, more like a man who was putting it away somewhere in a violent hurry than a man who was eating it—but he left off to take some of the liquor, shivered all the while, and then took it down in such a manner as he could do to keep the neck of the bottle between his teeth.

"I think you've got the ague," said I.

"I'm much of your opinion, boy," said he.

"It's bad about here. You've been lying out on the marshes, and they're dreadful agueish Rheumatic, too."

"I'll eat my breakfast afore they've the death of me," said he. "I'd do that, if I was going to be strung up to that there gallows as there is over there directly afterward. I'll beat the shivers so far, I'll bet you a guinea."

He was gobbling mince-meat, meat, bone-bread, cheese, and pork-pie all at once: stating distrustfully while he did so at the mist all round us, and often stopping—even stopping his jaws—to listen. Some real or fancied sound, some clink upon the river or breathing of beast on the marsh, more or less than a start, and he said, suddenly:

"You've not a false pie? You brought none with you?"

"No, Sir! No!"

"Nor any one the office to follow you?"

"No!"

"Well," said he, "I believe you. You'd be but a fierce young hound indeed, if at your time of life you could help to hunt a wretched warmint, hunted as nor dumb animal is hunted, all this poor wretched warmint is!"

THE EXPLOSION OF THE PROPELLER "GLOBE."

We publish on page 749, from a photograph taken by Mr. Altschuler, of Chicago, a picture of the propeller Globe, which was boiler exploded at Chicago on 8th inst. It seems that she was lying at the wharf, about to discharge a cargo of apples which she had brought from Buffalo, when the accident occurred. The engineer had received orders to get up steam on the donkey engine, to hoist out freight. The boiler was exceedingly hot, and but a trifling amount of steam on. The pumps were set at work, and the cold water pumped in at once caused the explosion. About fifteen people are supposed to have been killed by the explosion, among others, a gentleman named Hubbie, who had gone on board to look after some apples consigned to him, a little boy who was walking on the wharf picking up apples, and others.

THE PRINCIPAL BOARDER.

My aunt's boarders consisted, first, of myself—an appreciative then with a certain city optician; secondly, there were the Misses Dalton, (third), briefly, the widow of a coast-guard lieutenant, who called herself Mrs. Captain Browne; and fourthly, Mr. Simington, an East India merchant, who was believed to have made his fortune long ago, and to keep a business in Leadenhall Street by way of occupying his leisure hours. The architect of the cardinal, the pope of our establishment—in short, the principal boarder, was Mr. Simington, the East India merchant.

He was a stout, rosy man, about forty-five, good-humored and easy-going—disposed to make himself comfortable and keep friends with every body. Mr. Simington was a bachelor too; his two married sisters in Bloomsbury, his three tenders in the city, his nieces in Worcestershire, and his nephews in-East all agreed that was said to be the only point of agreement among them—that Mr. Simington never would marry. Mrs. Somers and her modern sisters showed in themselves of one opinion, whenever occasion served. He was too fond of his comforts, too confirmed in his bachelor ways, ever to change them. And why should Mr. Simington think of marrying at all? It was not a pretty face that would tempt him—he was a great deal too sensible for that; it was not fortune in a family—he had money enough, and did not care for high connections; it was not to have a comfortable home—where could he be better cared for, and more studied, than in Moonford Place? Such was the published conclusion of the fair trio. To Mrs. Captain Browne gave her adhesion now and then; but, like many manifestoes, its true reading was to be made out by contraries for, to my certain knowledge, the four ladies had, every one, private and deeply laid designs on Mr. Simington. He was one of those gentlemen given to pay attentions—I think most men between forty and fifty get given to them. He was a principal topic in the four ladies studying him, the East India merchant could scarcely do otherwise; so he paid attentions to each of the four, managing to be standing in the breeze, giving the largest share to my respected aunt, the first to be in my way. Sometimes, and the third to the maiden sisters, whose claims he balanced with such even-handed justice that both were equally sure of his love. It is easier conceived than which compels me to declare there was not a pretty face in the quartette.

I had an interior in the shape of Bessy, the orphan niece. Bessy was sixteen; but it would have been high treason against my aunt's crown and dignity, and brought down lightnings and thunders from the three next in command, to have called Bessy a young lady at sixteen. In fact, she did double duty in our establishment, filling at once the offices of dredge and little girl. Bessy was the child of a poor domestic drudge of our own female servant, Sally Stalks, whom my aunt called to sight. At what particular epoch Sally had might have served as a model to the workers in wax, but for the light of its long glittering blue eyes, which it could command at will, and the self that would go into wavy ringlets however clipped and combed. —all helped out the illusion, which her cruel did their best to promulgate by always speaking of Bessy as that poor child. My aunt was accustomed to say that she never knew which she pitied most as she would grow up, and the expense her education would be when Bessy was old enough to be sent to a finishing-school. The good lady was to do wonders for her protégée, when the proper period of womanhood arrived; but she considered it decidedly sinful to put notions of dress and vanity in children's heads. Bessy was never allowed to appear in the drawing-room except in the capacity of duster; and as she got nothing but old dresses shortened, the orphan niece went out only with messages to the green-grocer on week-days, and to evening church on Sundays with the maid.

My Aunt Somers always allowed that I was a young man of well-regulated mind—and she was right. On that prudent principle I did my best to think Beauy a child, though it sometimes struck me that going to bed in broad daylight on a summer evening, when there was a little dancing-party in the drawing-room, could not be to her taste; and I could not help fancying how well she would look in a long muslin frock and ringlets among the young ladies. The same judicious inclination to what was ordered and expected made me bow down before Mr. Sinnington. Oh, the warning of slippers, the shaving of walnuts, the last glass of that went on for that old gentleman in cold winter evenings! and the dulling on his seat when he came home from his summer rambles, as though the East India merchant had been three prodigals rolled into one! What well-governed youth could not have prostrated himself in spirit before such manifest superiority? so I towed down to Mr. Sinnington, served him, read to him, kept feeding my awe and worship, it sometimes occurred to me that he went out very regularly on Sunday evenings, just after Beauy and the maid set forth to church; that he must have taken a particular fancy to the green-grocer my own partisanship, as I often noticed him lingering near the shop; and probably sent intimations of his good-will by Beauy. For more than once I espied him pressing a penny chill on the stairs, and evidently intending not to be seen.

I had heard that great men were often eccentric, and doubtless these were the eccentricities of Mr. Sinnington; but as his peculiarities were not to be observed by an optician's apprentice, I made no report on the subject, and nobody else appeared to have taken note of them. Those things are by no not precisely say how long. The ladies were every day getting stronger in their public convictions of Mr. Sinnington's perpetual and unbounded more resolute in carrying on their private designs. I could live with him to one or two and twenty years, it was the best in every body's eyes but those of the other three. The summer was drawing to a close, and the extraordinary progress of the establishment. The four had been up most of the preceding night making his carpet-bag and packing delicacies for his reflection in steamer and train, and giving him good advice against catching cold and rheumatism. No wonder he looked tired over the abundant breakfast devoted to his service —so should any man if half so well taken care of. Mr. Sinnington, who mightily liked a joke, and complements that morning; the ladies, one and all, heard my name called in somewhere, and thought he so dull till he came back; and I saw Beauy in the deepest frock she had—by-the-by, it was also the shortest—steal past the window as if to be out of sight; she was doubtless bound for the green-grocer's. Nobody thought of her at the leave-taking, which was extraordinary. Mr. Sinnington, apprehensive of night fair hawn's own matters to be remembered; the address and wishes he got were all for the unveil all the travelers that ever crossed the Tweed; but at length the ceremony came to a close, and he cab drove away with him and his carpet-bag.

An hour or so afterward a ring at the door-bell, and enough to make my hair stand on end, I opened and listen. That was Mr. Sinnington's name I heard my name called in a kind of a yell. I had left the ladies talking in the breakfast-parlor, and there I found them on my rapid descent, gathered round Mrs. Sinnington, who clutched convulsively a pair of weddings-cards, while she questioned the waiter of the Barnsbury Hotel.

"It took place, Ma'am, about one hour ago," said that messenger of fate, making great efforts to preserve his gravity. "Miss Somers dressed at our house, and I must say looked uncommonly well in her white silks and nice bonnet. My missus went to church with them. It was a special license, you see. Mr. Ross, the gentleman as always stops with us, and knowed Mr. Sinnington from a boy, was the bride away; and, indeed, Ma'am, she got through it wonderfully. I went to see it myself, havin' a great likin' for marriages. The happy pair, I may say, waited on by the four; they've off to Scotland, Ma'am, by the Great Northern. But Mr. Ross is to do the needful over the cards; and says he, tippin' me half a crown, this a gentleman, as he is: 'Waiter, says he, 'run with these to Mr. Sinnington's, as has left the hotel to the earliest intelligence, for Mr. Sinnington was her principal boarder.'"

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

The full return of the election has not yet come in. It seems likely that Bell has carried Missouri and Kentucky; that Douglas has carried Virginia; that Breckinridge has a majority in Georgia, in which State, however, the opposition of electors is made by the Legislature, where no candidate has a majority of the popular vote. Four out of the eight non-Seward States are said to be so that he carries every Northern State on the Atlantic side. The majority for Lincoln in Pennsylvania will be over 60,000; in this State, about 35,000; in Indiana 15,000.

MR. LINCOLN ON THE TROUBLES IN THE SOUTH.

Disputes from Chicago and Springfield as to the policy of the President-elect with regard to the existing troubles in the South. Mr. Lincoln, it appears, does not design to give to the country any fresh exposition of his views and opinions upon the important questions which now convulse the country. His sentiments, as declared in his speech at the Cooper Institute in New York, and in Judge Douglas, and in the acceptance of the nomination for President at the Chicago platform, are referred to as embracing the principles and policy of his administration.

THE LEGISLATURE OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

The Legislature of South Carolina adjourned on 12th, having passed an act calling a Convention to take counsel respecting the duties of the State in this crisis; the Convention to meet on 17th December, the election to be held on 6th. An act was also passed providing for the cost of enlisting the banks to hold a certain proportion of specie to their liabilities. The greatest excitement prevails at Charleston, Columbia, and in the other towns of the State; and the the domains enslaved is rampant.

THE LEGISLATURE OF GEORGIA.

The Legislature in this State is in session. A bill appropriating $1,000,000 to be used at the discretion of the Governor for putting Georgia into a state of defence, passed the House of Representatives by a majority of 130 against 13. It is expected that it will be passed. The Joint Committee have agreed to report a bill for a Convention. Various bills and resolutions have been introduced with a view to the secession of the State, and the resistance of coercion. Opinion, however, seems less unanimous in this State than in South Carolina.

The Georgia Legislature is supposed to meet on 7th.

THE DISUNION CONVENTION IN ALABAMA.

A dispatch dated Montgomery, Alabama, November 15, says:

"The Governor of the State will issue a call for a State Convention to assemble on the 7th January next. He urges the people to prepare for secession.

"I send you the following extract in the letter of Governor Moore. After enumerating the wrongs that the South has suffered from the Federal Government, the Governor believes:—In full view and, I trust, just appreciation of all our obligations and responsibilities, I feel bound to appeal to my God, my State, and the Federal Government—I solemnly declare that, in my opinion, the only and true and secure security for Alabama and other slaveholding States is to secede from the Union. I deprecate the necessity of coming to such a conclusion. It has been forced upon me, and I live in the hope that the North will, in some way or other, speedily, fatally heal upon the destruction of institutions vital to the Southern States, unless our constitutional rights we have never disturbed, and who should be our friends—for I will not believe that they are the enemies—remember that Alabama must act and decide the great question of resistance or submission to wrong. To her alone belongs the right or power to decide it for her. She may and should consult with other States, but she must, in the secure sort of action, but still she must decide the question for herself. Her honor demands it. Her safety, her future great and political prosperity demands it. In the impending crisis, I counsel no factious feelings to enter the hearts of my people. Let the spirit of the Revolutionary fathers animate every one, and never will consent to affiliate with or submit to the rule of a Black Republican party. Let us be united, and true to duty toward them and the institution of slavery. They have kept faith with the Union. Let us do the same, and never consent to remain a degraded and dishonored member of it."

THE LEGISLATURE CONVENED IN MISSISSIPPI.

A dispatch dated Jackson, Mississippi, November 13, says: "Governor Pettus has issued a proclamation convening the State Legislature to-day, in view of the present necessity of providing more and better safeguards for the lives, liberties, and property of the people, than the late election and past action of the Northern State Governments promise.

A SPEECH BY MR. WISE.

A dispatch dated Columbia, South Carolina, November 13, says:

"Mr. Keitt was received by the people at twelve o'clock this day. He made an extended speech, which was received with decided acclaim. He said that Mr. Buchanan was a traitor to the South, and should be hung. He also declared that Mr. Lincoln's election was a fact, but he could not accomplish it otherwise, she would throw her sword out the pale of the Constitution and involve all the States in common ruin."

NO NORTHERN VACHTS TO BE ADMITTED INTO SOUTHERN PORTS.

Mayor Micham, on 15th, notified the agents of the Northern vessels lying that he intended to prevent, hereafter, the landing of thereupon passengers unless the steamship companies guaranteed the return of the slaves by the incoming vessels. The agents here have accordingly telegraphed to their owner such guarantee. The owner returns an evasion of an ominous hitherto a semi letter, but now refuses to give the bonds. The vessels are all anticipated destination next winter at the North crowds of passure will flood the Southern ports.

RELIEF FOR KANSAS.

A dispatch dated Atchison, Kansas Territory, November 13, says:

"Three car-loads of provisions arrived here yesterday and to-day for the relief of the destitute in the Kansas territory, making six car-loads within the past week, and one hundred and twenty-five in all. Over $1,000 in cash for present here waiting to be landed from Greenwood, Bolivar, Fredonia, and Iola, in Southern Kansas, and also for Osage City, in Osage county, who have proper credentials from the neighborhood from which they come, and who are appointed by the Relief Committee to receive them. The settlers in Southern Kansas are in a destitute and sad help throughout the winter."

AN HONORABLE EXAMPLE.

The New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Press says:

"A fact was communicated to me yesterday of a character so unprecedented in the political annals of this city that I cannot refrain from giving it publication even on my own author, that it deserves to be published and commended to the public gratitude. It is this: Mr. Ross, the first instance in the city where a high Federal officer has refused a position in the Federal Government on account of his political views. Mr. Ross is the General Dix, in the Custom House, soon for resigning upon the ground that he was not the person for the place, and that he was unsatisfactory for the party, and when the person selected as the successful candidate was put in nomination, Mr. Ross informed by the General that he would not permit the retention of a single one of his friends in office, and that for any such object; that the clerks were the business men of the establishment, and were paid and selected by the Government, and that it was an outrage to coerce from that class of business men to devote their time to party campaign. He was opposed to the practice in toto, and would not permit it in his office. Mr. Ross, formerly a Democrat, now of New York, he would not submit to any political requirement following the principles of Democracy in the public interest; but as Mr. Dix, a private citizen, he would thereby give the Democratic candidate a decided advantage, which he did. The thanks of every Government clerk in the employ of the late Secretary of the Treasury and the public act in their behalf. It is worthy the emulation of every permanent officer of Government, and of the Democracy and especially deserving of the heartiest commendation of the press."

PERSONAL.

Solomon Panglossy, who died in is now one hundred and nine years old, walked from the residence of his son-in-law, Mr. Vallandigham, to the polls, on 6th, to the Eighth Ward polls in Cincinnati, and deposited his vote for Douglas and Johnson. The old man was born in the General Washington for President in 1789, and has voted at every Presidential election since, and has never voted for a Democratic candidate, and has therefore voted for President seventeen times.

William Armstrong, a sailor, arrived at Galway in the Tower Abbey, fifth ship, with a tale of great misery and suffering. He says he was on the bark Kitty, from Newfoundland, bound to Lisbon, when on 15th October the Company was wrecked August 11, by contact with ice, and sank in a few minutes. Captain Valiquette, the mate, and before the bark was crushed and sank; worked several days in the long boat, and finally reached land, after suffering from cold; at last got into clear water, was issued by the crew of the Tower Abbey, and landed at Galway. Armstrong and the crew speak in the highest terms of the boat's fate unknown. He was succeed by Equimaux, and the crew of Messrs. Meaghe in Labrador, are known to be John, Newfoundland.

The property of Nicholas Longworth, of Cincinnati, is said to have been ascertained, within a few days, to be as follows: Real estate, $2,000,000; personal property, $1,500,000. Total, $3,500,000.

The gallant Colonel F. W. Lander, of overland wagon-road expedition celebrity, has just been joined in the bonds of matrimony with the only and favorite nephew, Miss Jane M. Davenport. The Rev. Thomas Starr King officiated in the presence of a large party, on Tuesday evening. The happy couple started immediately on an overland expedition to San Jose, to pass the honeymoon at one of the delightful retreats in that valley. It is understood that Mrs. Lander will retire from the stage immediately upon the completion of her present engagements on the Atlantic side.

Young Lincoln, son of the President-elect, now in Harvard College, was, on Wednesday night, called upon by a large body of the students in that institution, and congratulated upon the success of his father.

Miss Harriet Hosmer, who left Boston for Rome about a fortnight since, will be followed next month by Miss Margaret F. Foley, the well-known cameo-cutter and sculptor.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

BRITISH OPINION ON THE ITALIAN QUESTION.

The London Daily News publishes the text of the dispatch from Earl Russell to Sir Augustus Paget, Minister at Turin, dated October 27. Lord John says the great question which appears to the British Government to be at issue are these: Were the people of Italy justified in solving the assistance of King of Sardinia to enter them from governments with which they were discontented; and was the King of Sardinia justified in rendering that assistance of his army? His Lordship says her Majesty's Government do not feel justified in declaring that the people of Southern Italy had not good reasons for throwing off the Government of Naples, and for calling on the King of Sardinia. The dispatch closes as follows: Her Majesty's Government do not feel at all upon rather the conflicting prospects of the people building up the edifice of their own freedom, and the natural wishes of their independence amidst the sympathies and good wishes of Europe.

THE QUEEN IN A SHOWER.

One morning last week the Queen, attended by the ladies and gentlemen of the Court, rode out on horseback, and was caught in a heavy shower. Her Majesty was overtaken by a shower of rain. As they were passing the lodge-gate at the Long Walk, the Queen saw two old women who were standing near asked if they might be permitted to offer her Queen and her lady in waiting shelter from the weather. The offer was graciously accepted by her Majesty. Short-ly after the Queen and her lady in waiting therefore were brought back to the young gentlemen by Lord Alfred Paget, the Queen's Master of the Horse, and the gentlemen on the obverse side of a sovereign, which the Queen presented to each of the old women, expressive of their sense of the kindness which they had shown to time in having them appended to their wretched dwelling. The women were highly pleased with the present, though ignorant of the value of their gold watches: The names of the worthy subject of her Majesty's bounty are Mrs. Mary Ann Mercier for Stafford, both pupils in the house of Mr. Waite.

FRANCE.

PRIGHTFUL CRIME AND SUICIDE.

The Lyons Courrier of 10th, has the scene of a frightful crime. At about seven o'clock in the evening of the previous day, a murder was first discovered by a Mademoiselle Jeanne, daughter of the proprietor. The deed was perpetrated on the person of a rich, meticulously broken open, and a horrible spectacle presented itself. On the floor, in the midst of blood, lay that of Mademoiselle Jeanne, aged 15, and the other that of Mademoiselle Rosalie, the elder sister of the host. The first event is said to have taken place under the following circumstances: The young girl, during the absence of Gaspiol had given rise to many complaints since he had left the house, and had received a severe reprimand. Madame Brunet had determined on dismissing him, and two days before the murder had given him notice of it. His leaving made an affair of marriage to the daughter is also said to have been opposed by the parents, but that, as well as it may, he appears to have decided on taking vengeance on the family. On the evening of the 9th, however, he contrives to introduce himself into the room of the unfortunate young girl, and there knows for her sister, and diminishes her charms. After having locked the door and taken out the key, he proceeds to the work of murder. The first man declared a proof at the breast of his victim, and immediately fell dead. The second blow followed. The death of both must have been instantaneous. Four pistol shots were then fired by the murderer, probably with a view of making himself sure. During the whole of the day the house was deserted by the servants, who dared not. It was found necessary to place sentinels at the door.

ITALY.

THE BATTLE OF GARIGLIANO.

According to the Neapolitan accounts, Cialdini was beaten by the Neapolitans on the great line at Garigliano; some illegible glorying his troops as high as two thousand killed and wounded, and five guns. Official dispatches from Turin say these assertions are completely false. The Neapolitans are defeated at all points.

Capua was attacked on the 1st, and capitulated on the following night.

The Naples correspondent of the London Daily News telegraphs as follows:

"NAPLES, November 2, 1860.

"Capua capitulated to-day, and the troops have the honors of war, but lay down their arms at the Porta di Napoli. The Royal Family and the Consulate of the French.

Gaeta was nothing as to Victor Emanuel's visit to Naples.

The London Daily News of the 31st ult. says the Emperor of the French has placed four ships-of-the-line before Gaeta, with orders to take no attack on that fortress by Admiral Persano, and if necessary to sink his ships. Under these circumstances, it is difficult to take as true the part in the approaching siege of Gaeta. The Lonon Daily News correspondent at Naples says that the Neapolitans and Swiss troops must not be allowed to remain a victim to the fury of the populace of Naples.

The Pope has issued a decree, in which he says that his approaching siege of Gaeta. The London Daily News correspondent at Naples says that the Neapolitans and Swiss troops must not be allowed to remain a victim to the fury of the populace of Naples.

Capua had been definitely occupied by Garibaldi's troops.

THE VOTING AT NAPLES.

A newspaper correspondence writes: "To-day of voting at Naples commenced in the most unprecedentedly cordial desire. By a strange coincidence a number of the Neapolitan Guards, on Count Cavour's side, are mounting guard at the doors of the voting-rooms.

Field Marshal Lecchi, and in a few minutes the distinguished General Garibaldi, with Signor Crispi. At eight in the morning the National Guard voted in a body, before the Municipal Council, and the Syndic declared that they might take up their positions in the different quarters of the town, and commence their peaceful functions for the day. There was very little apparent excitement about the town. No more Bagh than usual were hung out; a few addresses to the people were posted on the walls urging them to vote, but attracted little attention, and the streets certainly were not more, if so much, crowded than on an ordinary bright Sunday. On the other hand, if there was little noisy excitement, there was a look of genuine determination on almost every visible countenance. In the twelve sections of the city there were twelve polling-places, six almost all in the Chiaia district, such as the portico of the Church of San Vincenzo di Paola; before the Palace; or the Albergo del Povori, on the Cavetta Road. In front of the booth there were a few footmen and carriages, and a scarlet cloth on which was worked in letters of gold the question which the people were called to vote on: "Il Popolo vuole l'Italia una ed indivisibile, con Vittorio Emanuele Re constitutionale, e suoi legittimi discendenti." Over the booth was the popular motto inscribed, but this was not the only occasion of the kind. The preparations for voting were of the simplest kind. On a low platform there was a cylindrical box shaped like a hat-box, with a hole in the top pierced, and either side two large wooden tubes were placed—the one on the right for the votes of yes, and that with the word inscribed "no," the other, on the left, for the "No" tickets. Round the urn was a table, at which were the Chief of the district, or alderman of the ward, was seated, with a broad tricolor scarf over his shoulder, and attended by one or three officials in full dress. Behind the table, again, were two or three benches for friends or friends of the authorities, or foreigners, were allowed to seat themselves. As each person voted his name was shouted by the scrutator, authorizing him to vote; was asked by the President if he had voted before, if he was of age, and if he had a ticket, which he dropped into the urn; and then passed out by a door behind, which led through the garden into a road. At all the booths the proceedings were quiet and orderly in the extreme. Even the Prince, who had just returned to Naples, was vociferously cheered by the crowd as he went up to give his vote; and the famous Strangford, the brother of the Neapolitan people, was allowed to vote, and was received with the greatest cordiality and good-will by the admirers. Two Garibaldian soldiers appeared at the booth, and by writing their names on the register showed that they believed that the enumeration was ridiculous. The Garibaldian soldiers were very few; the number of "No" voters was very small. At the Albergo del Povori there were only 30 "No"—and yet by a given by old pensioners, who said they had eaten the king's bread for years, and would not condemn him now; and the others by two tradesmen who had been purveyors to the late King. At the close of the voting in the hospital for Negroes, with the exception of two privateers, the returns from which are still wanting, were as follows:

Ayes	1,102,489
Noes	10,312

GARIBALDI AND THE STRONG WOMAN.

There is at Naples an immense, strong woman, about twenty years old, named Donna Vincenza, commonly designated—I am unable to tell why—as La. S. Giovanni. She is a native of Procida, and is much admired by many of the lower classes, where they sing in and have a song in her honor. She is known as a Lodesana in the pair of bald-and-be-t. This woman is the great popular tribune of the people, and it is said that when his own cabinet adopted the measure implicitly followed her guidance. On Garibaldi's arrival at once proposed to make her a baron, and was most cordially received, because Garibaldi generally likes a woman who can drink wine like a man, such as S. Giovanni and the like. She often goes into the wine shops, and, to encourage the people, drinks with them; but they hope not to be about thirty pounds, among them the Garibaldi, and the Garibaldi, and the Garibaldi, interviews with Garibaldi. He was not in the best position to receive her in his own house. He had been sent to the mountains with typhoid fever, and did not wish to see anyone; but on being informed that the strong woman was in the ante-room, he ordered her to be brought in. The strong woman came, and, on seeing the General, fell on her knees before him, in the presence of the Dictator, Prince Pallavicini, and many other officers, he said to her, "Now give me a kiss, and I will make you a baron." She replied that she have smoked, and having obtained that the interview was over, left the room. The strong woman drew out almost merely after the usual fashion of her class. A dark, handsome girl, with a profusion of black hair, and no sitting on her head. By her side she carries two revolvers and a dagger. Her dress is also very peculiar and very little. She has a severe, but cold-chilled expression. She is born in Ischia, and is a native of that island. When she shakes hands with you at parting she seems to look upon you as a personal enemy, and has, in fact, a way of understand one another. In consequence therefore of her peculiar manners, and the other circumstances of her life, she has been declared the right of voting, an exception has been made in favor of Donna Marianna, and she has deposited her "Sì" in the urn along with Peretz, Spaventa, Cappelli, and the rest of the Neapolitan Liberals. Garibaldi, who has been declared a citizen of Naples, and has been elected to the parliament of Naples. The p.o-Director, Pallavicini, did the same. It is impossible to learn what the Dictator's opinion is on the subject at the moment when Garibaldi traversed the city in an open carriage with the Prince Pallavicini. Every body seemed to take him. Every body wished to touch him. Prolonged cheers followed him. The Garibaldi, and the Garibaldi, and the Garibaldi, and the Garibaldi, and the Garibaldi, and the Garibaldi, where he remained until night.

AUSTRIA.

THE NEW AUSTRIAN POLICY.

According to a correspondence received from Berlin, Prince Metternich has appointed to M. Thouvenel the Austrian Note, which is to be presented to the Cabinet:

1. The interior policy of every State being intimately connected with its external policy, Austria will claim with sincerity the reforms announced by the Diploma of the 20th October.

2. Notwithstanding the complications in Italy, Austria will maintain a large line of defensive in the present armaments and concentration of troops in Venetia have no other object than to secure the integrity of her States.

3. Austria will not abandon the system of non-intervention.

4. Austria considers that the assembling of a congress would not have for object a practical solution of the Italian question unless the great Powers agree beforehand on a common programme, of which, however, there is little likelihood.

SPAIN.

SPANISH OPINION ON THE ITALIAN QUESTION.

Marshal O'Donnell, in Cortes on the 29th, referred that the Italian question would remain in the hands of Italy. He also protested against the double expressed of the Pope's temporal power, and declared that the Spanish Government would announce to the Senate that Rome would preserve from any assault by the Spanish troops, and would be chosen by the Spanish in the affairs of Italy.

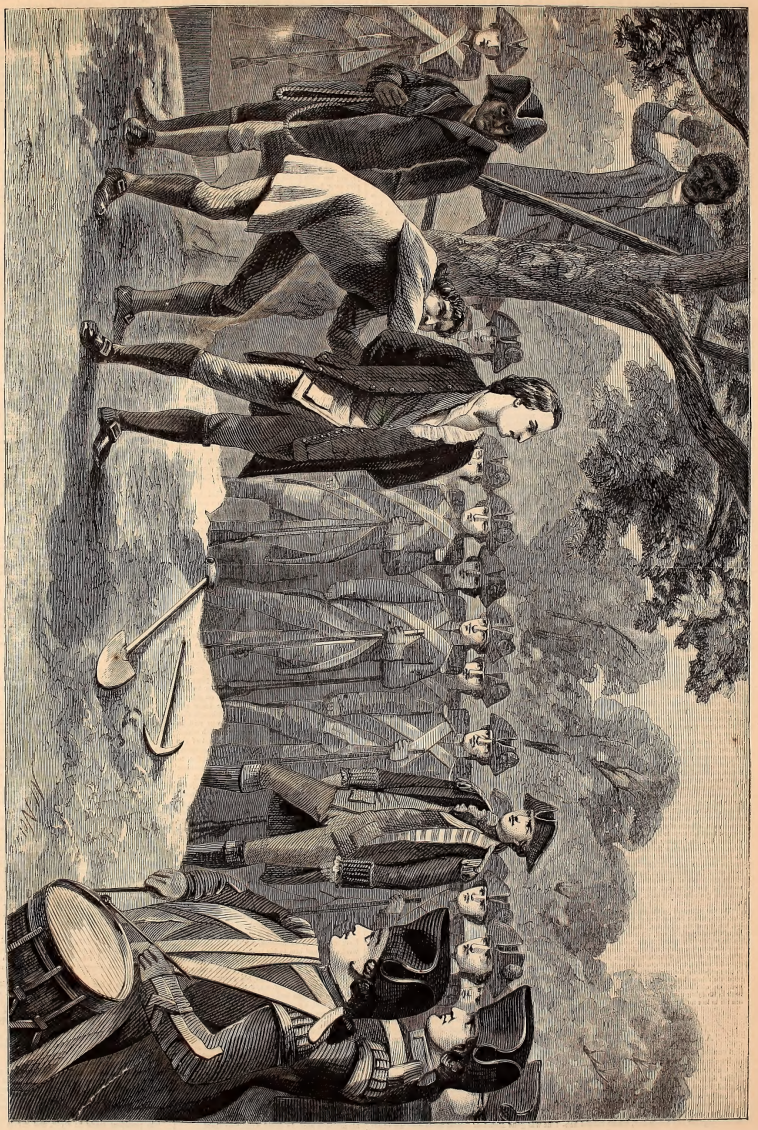
SPANISH BOGUS.

The Bayonne Messager states that a child fifteen months old, belonging to Protestant parents of that city, died a few days ago. The Curé of the parish refused to bury it, but that the clergy of the place, on account of the parents' religion, refused to bury it. The body was carried to the official father set out with the corpse to Urtubie, and there arriving at 4 o'clock in the morning, he found the cemetery closed, and the gates locked and barred against him. While waiting for the permission he was compelled to deposit the child in the porch of a lodge near the cemetery house, on the lonely of the Bishop; and the chief on duty had plied him with questions. "If it is so hasty you did not your permission I will have the body cast into the river." Fortunately for the priest, the gate-keeper arrived in the morning father having brought his child's remains into France, had them interred with Christian rite in a cemetery.

CHINA.

CAPTURE OF THE TAKU FORTS.

On the 31st August the Allies, after a vehement resistance, carried the Taku forts, the important of the Taku forts. Two hundred French and two hundred English were put hors de combat. One thousand Tartars killed were found in the fort, among whom was the General-in-chief. The other forts surrendered successively the same evening.



The capitulation gave the Allies the whole country as far as Tien-Tsin, and six hundred horse guns of large calibre.

The Ambassadors proceeded to Tien-Tsin, where Chinese Commissioners were awaited their arrival.

It was reported that the Ambassadors would soon proceed to Pekin, with a cavalry escort.

PATRIOTS OF THE OLDEN TIME.

We publish on the two pre-ceding pages a couple of pictures which will stir the patriotic blood in every true American's heart. The first represents that thrilling scene in the career of Sergeant Jasper, of South Carolina, when he gave up his life for his country; the other the final act in the glorious career of Nathan Hale, of Connecticut, who, when called upon to make the same sacrifice, regretted that he had but one life to surrender for his native cause. A very few words will recall the scenes to the mind of our readers.

Sergeant Jasper first rose to public notice at the time of the attack on Fort Moultrie, in the Harbor of Charleston, on 28th June, 1776. He was serving with his Regiment—the 2d South Carolina Regiment—in the fort when the British ships took up their positions and opened fire. At the commencement of the action a ball from a British vessel struck the flag-staff on the fort, and the Crescent Flag of South Carolina fell upon the wash of shells. Jasper leaped upon the parapet, walked the whole length of the fort, under a hail of shot and shell from the ships, picked up the flag, fastened it upon a sponge staff, and fixed it anew firmly upon the bastion; then leaped back unhurt among the cannoneers. For this gallant exploit he was offered the rank of lieutenant, but refused, saying that he was only a sergeant, and not fit to a post of such dignity. A short while afterward he succeeded, by an ingenious stratagem, in rescuing a prisoner named Jones from the hands of the British, who were about to hang him. The scene of the transaction was a spring near Savannah, which still goes by the name of Jasper's Spring. Jasper's exploit was at the famous attack on Savannah by the combined British and American forces on the 9th October, 1779. Day was just breaking in fog and mist as the French under General D'Estaing, and the American under Lincoln and Pulaski, advanced the abatis, entered the ditch, ran across, and springing upon the parapet, planted their flags there, side by side. The French flag was raised by one of D'Estaing's aids, who soon fell mortally wounded, as also did the officer who held the flag of the Carolina flag. Lieutenant Gray, of the South Carolina Regiment, then sprang upon the parapet, and held the flag till he too was struck down. The place was instantly taken by Sergeant Jasper, who was in the act of planting the flag-staff firmly on the parapet when he was struck in the side, and fell back dying. The flag had been worked for the South Carolina 2d Regiment by Mrs. Sarah Gendell, and had been presented by her to the regiment just after the battle of Fort Moultrie. As Jasper fell, he turned to the Color Party, and said,

"Tell Mrs. Elliott I lost my life supporting the colors she gave to our regiment."

The last days of Nathan Hale is thus told in a note to Washington Irving's "Life of Washington:"

"Born in Coventry, Connecticut, June 6, 1755, he entered Yale College in 1755, and graduated with some distinction in September, 1773, having previously undergone an engagement of marriage; not unlike Andrei in this respect, as well as in his 'Honors' at eighteen. He remained college he engaged as a teacher, as is common with young men in New England while studying for a profession. His half-formed purpose was to devote himself to the military. As a teacher of youth he was eminently skilful, and equally approved by parents and pupils. He became universally popular. 'Every body loved him,' said a lady of his acquaintance, 'he was so handsome, graceful, great, and kind, and so handsome!'

"He was teaching in New London when an express arrived bringing tidings of the outbreak at Lexington. A town meeting was called, and Hale was among the most ardent of the speakers, proposing an instant march to the scene of hostilities, and offering to volunteer. 'A sense of duty,' writes his friend to his father, 'urged me more than every thing for my country.'

"He served in the army before Boston as a lieutenant, prevailing on his company to extend their terms of service by offering him his own pay; and his good conduct received from Congress the commission of captain. He commanded a company in Colonel Charles Webb's regiment in the following year. After the disastrous battle of Long Island Washington applied to that officer for a competent person to penetrate the camp and secure the accurate intelligence of their designs, a service deemed vital in that dreadful emergency. Hale, in the spirit of patriotism, volunteered for the inevitable enterprise, though fully aware of the peril and the consequences of failure.

"Assuming his old character as schoolmaster, he crossed the Sound in a sloop from Norwalk to Huntington, on Long Island, visiting the British encampments unsuspected; made drawings of the enemy's works, and noted down memoranda in Latin of the information he gathered; and then retraced his steps to Huntington, where a boat was to meet him to convey back to the Connecticut shore. Unfortunately a British guard-ship was at that time anchored in view of the bonds, and prevented the boat on shore for water. Hale mistook it for the expected boat, and did not discover his mistake until he found himself in the hands of his enemies. He was stripped and searched; the plan and memoranda were found concealed in the soles of his shoes, and proved him to be a spy.

"He was conveyed to the guard-ship, and thence to New York, where he was landed on the 21st of September, the day of the great fire. He was taken to General Howe's head-quarters, and, after brief parley with his officers, ordered to execution the next morning at day-break—a sentence carried out by the provost-marshal, the brutal and infamous Cunningham, who refused his request for a Bible, and destroyed a letter he had addressed to his mother, for the reason afterward given by himself, 'that the rebels should never know they had a man who could die with such firmness.' His patriot spirit shone forth in his dying words: 'I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country.'"

A BEAUTIFUL DEVIL.

ANGELIQUE TIQUET is the heroine of an old and prolix chronicle, from which is compiled the following true romance:

Her father, Jean Auguste Carlier, having some capital, entered into partnership with a rich old bookseller and jeweler of Metz, whose only child he subsequently married. The old man died soon after the marriage, bequeathing his whole property to his daughter and son-in-law, where carnal lusts its daily added to its bulk. Madame Carlier died eight years after marriage, leaving a daughter of seven (Thin Angelique), and a two-year old son, named Auguste. Carlier did not marry again, but lived for his children. He was a man of some learning, and when the shop was closed in the evening employed himself in teaching his boy and girl, who both had quick abilities. Madame de Remonet, an aunt of the deceased Madame Carlier, had been one of the loveliest women of her time, and, although a widow, had many admirers, who captivated the fancy of a youth of rank, who, in spite of the opposition of his friends, made her his wife, and obtained a post at court. Her beauty, her beauty, wit, and talents for intrigue forced her into favor, in those days, when Anne of Austria, in the name of her regent son, was ruling France, where the standard of public opinion in France demanded, at no high price, that morality should be ignored, therefore, a brilliant and heedless life, until the sudden death of her husband left her with a pension for the support of her only surviving child, she was accustomed. Yet she made no visible change, except to become more reckless in her modes of life, till after the death of her son by a sudden death or estrangement of some of her patrons, and the consequent withdrawal of her pension, and, despite the work of age, caused her to think of some certainty of a home for her declining years. Her relations in Metz had long ceased to correspond with her, but as she knew her brother and niece to be dead, and her nephew to be wealthy, she determined to proceed to Metz, and there, if possible, to find a fixture there. At Metz she was so unlucky to her nephew-in-law, so mortified with the children, and resented to be so hypocritical, that Madame Carlier, whose comforts were the greater for her care of it, has bestowed considerable sums upon them. She accepted this offer with tears of gratitude; but as the quiet economy of the household by no means satisfied her taste, she commenced a series of reforms so radical changes in all matters of expenditure. In this attempt, however, she did not succeed. Her brother, through kind and gentle, was firm in many matters, his own master. Yet he was blind to the bad character of the woman who had charge of his children as guide and companion: a woman selfish, rapacious, avaricious, utterly unprincipled, and heartless. Over the children she at once threw the gilded a complete ascendency. Auguste was armed against her with simplicity of character, and him she hated, therefore, with all the power his the tenderest endearments. After three years, during her brother's absence, she succeeded in her turn to Paris. Imposing, therefore, upon Carlier with a specious tale that it was necessary for her to go to the convent of the Ursulines in the town of Metz, but kept her hold upon the mind of Angelique. She induced him to give his daughter the advantages of Paris education, and to place her in the convent of which the nuns were celebrated for proficiency in teaching. Thither Angelique was sent, and she spent all her holidays with her aunt. Carlier went often to Paris after his daughter's removal thither, and was pleased to find that instruction his aunt paid the girl. On one of these occasions he allowed the acute lady to discover that his will was made, and that he had left to his daughter little more than a million of livres, equally divided between her and her daughter, Madame de Remonet sole guardian. He dined with his aunt frequently, and half an hour afterward left in the diligence for Metz. He never saw her again.

He had never been a strong man, the time was mid-winter, the weather terribly severe. His death was ascribed to the cold he had taken on the road in his coeble constitution.

Madame de Remonet would seem to have had a presentiment of the impending catastrophe, for she had every thing ready for a journey when the news arrived, and she set out for Metz, via Strasbourg, without an hour's delay. On their arrival they found Carlier buried, and the passionate grief of Madame de Remonet was the theme of the whole city.

Angélique was now nearly sixteen, exquisitely beautiful, with hair marvelously long and abundant, so that, when let loose, it covered her almost to her feet. Her eyes were of the deepest blue, gleams of light on it, as if sprinkled with gold-dust. So lovely a beauty Madame de Remonet was inspired to make subservient to her wish. She had the sale of Carlier's effects as much as possible, selecting what she thought fit to retain, and in a month after her arrival left Metz for Paris never to Paris with her two young wards. The best apartments in a handsome house in the Faubourg St. Germain, with all the cumbrous luxury of the period, a complete staff of domestics was engaged, and a career of dissipation began for the two orphans, and the young heiress; and among the rest came a young man named Henri St. Chauvert, whose father, the principal agent in Metz, was Carlier's close friend. Henri was clever and energetic, and although disfigured in his face by the small-pox, he ever had who cared for herself alone. Among the crowd were two, especially distinguished: the one by Madame de Remonet, the other by her niece. The first was Monsieur Tiquet, President of the Parliament of Paris, whose relations with Madame had formerly been very intimate. He was old, ugly, and disagreeable. He had by extravagance a large fortune, which he was pro-tuous sinful him. The aunt favored his pretensions; for the president had found himself to pay her a large sum on the day when he should marry Angelique. The girl herself inclined to a young Chevalier de Mongeorges, who was an officer by the King's Guards; handsome, witty, accomplished, and really in love, according to the fashion of the age and country. Mongeorges's family required high birth in his bride, and endeavored to detach him from his mistress. They procured from the King his appointment to a subordinate in a regiment ordered to a remote part of the kingdom; and while he was gone Monsieur Tiquet made good use of his absence. Madame de Remonet assisted efficiently. Angelique was assailed by fêtes and costly gifts. She could not withstand so gallant and priestly an adorer, and in a few weeks became Madame Tiquet.

Passionately adoring his young wife, the president was jealous of her lightest look. As Angelique had been prepared for her married life, in an intimation from her aunt that marriage by a means enriched lovers, she insisted on choosing like a princess, and on entertaining a throng of adorers. Her husband winked at her domesticity, and had become, as worldlifts sometimes do become, miserly, now that he had again a fortune. Constant and hopeless contention was the consequence, and, to make matters worse, Mongeorges, whose friends had been made happy by Angelique's marriage, was ordered to Paris, and became her satellite. Monsieur Tiquet at last refused to supply her with money beyond a very small allowance. She applied then to her aunt, who, by supplying her with funds, still further established ascendency over her. She repeatedly spoke to her new fortunate it would be were Auguste to die; for Monsieur Carlier's will had decreed that if either of his heirs died without issue, the fortune of the deceased should go to the survivor. If both died children, all was to be applied to the use of various charities, and a small sum left to Madame Remonet. Angelique ran into debt; her husband refused positive assistance or assurance her difficulties; and, finally, professed to be unable to supply further demands, advised an application to Monsieur Carlier, who, with his usual composure, acknowledge that she was already his debtor for large sums, which he had heavily involved himself to procure. "But," he added, "I am sure you duly consider the next terrible suggestion. "He is pure and just, but, as you know, he is old and not very maturity. Yet he keeps you, who so much need his money, from a vast deal of enjoyment!"

No more was said then that occasion, but at subsequent interviews the subject was revived. Auguste was a boy of thirteen, delicate and quiet, timid and reserved, shrinking much neglected by his aunt and sister, but loved and sedulously cared for by his father, who he was by his side. In health grew worse and worse. Violent sickness, internal cramps, and racking pains, soon brought him to death's door. Carlier, who for about three months from the time of the first serious attack he died. No one suspected foul play. The boy had been ill before, and was not now exempt the sweats and his utter. Its fortune went to Angélique; and Madame, some days afterward, presented her aunt with two thousand livres and a magnificent Cashmere shawl.

Monsieur Tiquet, somewhat mollified by his wife's increase of fortune, conceded to her many of her demands, and relaxed somewhat of his vigilance. Gradually Angelique took to live in her own society that at last Monsieur Tiquet gave his parole, who was a Cassan named Catellain, strict orders not to permit the entrance of his mistress, unless in company with himself, or on showing a written order from him. Angelique, who thought no man to her list of lovers, still was free to attend revels and masquerades, until her husband, disgusted with her extravagance, dismissed him, and himself kept the keys.

Of course Madame de Remonet was again taken into council (a well paid), and, in accordance with her advice, Angélique ceased opposition to her husband's wishes, pretended to regain his confidence. As if to crown his happiness, a little girl was now born, and the consequent seclusion of the young mother gave the president reason to hope that for the future all was well. But with Angélique's returning health returned her taste for pleasure, and her fascinations in her manner to her husband, but she now and then insisted on attending places of entertainment at which he knew she must meet Mongeorge. Cattelain, although dismissed from the president's service, was still in that of the lady, and was bribed to connive which he set up a sort of cabaret in a remote part of the town. To that house, as was afterward discovered, Angelique frequently went in disguise to meet Mongeorge and others. About the same time Madame de Remonet's daughter was forming the bonds of Paris, and drew—as the spiritualists now draw—crowds of all ranks to her séances. Among the applicants bestowed the strongest on an acquaintance, where there was assembled a large party of both sexes, and displayed so much animation that Madame de Remonet, who had a particularly pleasant bad received. Her answer was afterward brought to her by the lady herself.

"Yes," said she, "I have been to the fortune-teller, and she has solemnly assured me that I shall be released from my husband by the death of the great plague of my life. Of course I knew that must be Monsieur Tiquet; so I besought her to say if I should be soon. She said it only depended on myself perfectly happy; but she would do no more than answer what I was told. However, the thought that he may soon die is something to live for."

At this time Monsieur Tiquet was recovering from a severe illness, which had for several weeks confined him to his room, where he was attended by a valet, named Servin, as old as himself, who had lived with him thirty years, and who, looking with disfavor upon his young mistress, interested more of her ways than she supposed.

A certain regimen had been prescribed for the invalid, of which a strong broth, to be taken at noon, formed a portion. Angelique, who was now become becoming a domestic wife, insisted on preparing this broth herself. Servin had his own views on this proposal, and resolved to mature stratagem by stratagem. On the first day of Angélique's acting as cook, the valet took a pot dog of the president's, a pretty white spaniel, and shut it into his own chamber. Taking care to be in the way at the right moment, he took the broth for her hands to carry to his master; but on his way to the sick-room visited his own, and pouring at least half the contents of the bowl on a plate, set it before the dog, and again shut him up. When he reached his master's room he found Angélique there.

"Where have you delayed?" she asked.

"I spilt some of the soup, Madame, and could not appear before my master till I had changed my coat, which was splashed."

"Ah!" The cry was from Angélique, and was caused by Servin, whose foot slipped on the waxed and slippery margin beyond the carpet, that he fell and broke the bowl. Angélique was enraged, but her anger only convinced the valet more that he was right in his suspicion. Yet to his astonishment the dog did not suffer, but continued perfectly well. Meanwhile he had eaten the whole portion allotted to him. The valet was therefore obliged to conclude that no poison had been mixed in the soup. Angélique continued to prepare it, and Servin persevered in always taking out a portion for the dog before he gave it to his master. It was excellent, and both the dog and his master appeared the better for it. So things went on for about three weeks, when Servin, on taking the broth from his mistress one day, fancied that he discovered a bitterness in the taste of it. He tasted it again in his hearing, too, she ordered her footman to accompany her directly, on a visit to Madame de Remonet. Servin hastened to feed the dog, having determined to make sure that his mistress was gone out. He was in the act of pouring out the broth when an angry exclamation startled him, and he saw his master standing by.

"Do you dare to give my luncheon to the dog?" he said; and made Servin precede him to his chamber, where he sent himself before the tray. An old dog, the valet resentful to his lips the fatal of valet arrested his hand.

"Do not taste it, my dear master," he said; "it is poisoned."

"What do you say?"

"Your words are true."

Servin brought in the dog and gave him all the broth. Not a word was spoken either by master or servant for about a quarter of an hour, during which the dog, heavy with a full meal, had gone to sleep before the fire. At last it seemed to awaken, howled, rolled, and died. After writhing in convulsions, and was violently sick. In a minute more the dog was dead.

There was now no doubt of Angélique's intention, but the old president implored Servin, with tears, not to expose her to justice. The valet was easily promised, on condition that his master never after ate drank any thing but what he himself prepared and brought. It was resolved between them to conceal their knowledge of the attempt as far as possible, and to watch Angélique to believe that the broth had been taken by her husband, who would feign illness. He therefore retired to bed, and was scarcely there when Angélique returned.

"I'm ill!" she exclaimed; "I hope you are not worse!"

He made no answer, but Servin, in a whisper, told her that his master had suddenly become very ill, and that perfect quiet would be necessary for a few days. During which days Angélique was left unmolested, and was not, but, to what she would, for she was not to be quiet. But if she desired him to fetch any thing, he had it at hand in a closet, or rang for another servant, saying that the doctor had ordered him never to leave his master for an instant. On the evening of the second day the valet had gone to the cupboard for something, and the president, fancying he left them, asked for a glass of eau sucrée. Angélique flew to a table, stirred in a powder she took from something from a little bottle which she hastily replaced in the bosom of her dress.

The glass was suddenly taken from her hand. A half-stifled scream betrayed her terror; but Servin, dispensing with all ceremony, led her from the room, and, locking the chamber-door, handed them, said sternly,

"This and much longer, Madame; you have put something by mistake into my master's eau sucrée. I must learn from the physician what it is. Two days ago you made a similar mistake with Monsieur's broth; but as it was Fifine who drank it, that did not so much matter, except that the dog died in such a thing!" He paused answer, but steadying herself against the balustrade of the staircase, looked at the valet with a scornful eye. "Madame sees that to preserve my master from such accidents in future it is necessary that I should take the food and tea which he himself prepares." Servin, touching the glass. "But it would simplify matters amazingly if Madame would be so obliging as to drink the phial which is in the folds of her dress."

"You will not betray me!"

"On one condition, Madame, I will not. You must leave the care of my master altogether to me, and be content to see him and me and you make nervous mistakes which might be fatal. In future, I shall make the drinks, and, further, you will not leave the house. I shall be most carefully aside, with this glass, lest, in an unhappy moment of forgetfulness, something might occur which would render it necessary for me to produce them."

He had scarcely spoken when she dashed the glass from his hand, and the contents, mingled with the shattered fragments, fell through the balustrades, and rained on the staircase beneath them.

"I promise what you ask," she said, with a flash of triumph in her eyes. "The phial contains only an eye-wash."

The valet shook his head.

"You can not come into my master's chamber again, Madame, if you do—"

He paused, and returned to the president, who had seen the beginning of the affair, and who now sat up in the bed trembling with anxiety.

"Again!" he asked.

"Again; but I have explained to Madame that she must come here no more." The wretched old president cast himself down on the pillow moaning.

"Calm yourself, Monsieur," said the valet; "I will not say any thing of this unless it should become necessary."

The president made no reply, and Servin procended to arrange the room for the night: taking his own place in an arm-chair beside the bed.

The night wore on, and when the old man fell asleep at about midnight, Servin felt inclined to follow his example. Yet an undefined fear warned him to be watchful. He arose from the chair and moved about the room, opening the curtains, and gazing out into the dark and stormy night; he stirred the fire, placed himself beside it, trimming the lamp, and taking up a book; but he could hear Angélique, whose apartment adjoined that of her father, moving cautiously about, and he was unable to fix his attention on the pages. Presently the sounds in her chamber ceased, and nothing was to be heard save the moan of the wind without, and the crackling of the fresh wood he had piled on the hearth. He felt that the desire to sleep was overcoming him, and, casting about for means of rousing himself, it occurred to him to make some noise. Noiselessly opening the door, he listened for a moment at Angélique's door; all was still there; he peered through the keyhole, but there was no light within, except from the flicker of her dying fire. Feeling that all was safe, he returned to his master's chamber, and taking a light, trod carefully along the corridor, and down the staircase to the lower story, to get the articles he needed.

Scarcely had he reached the lowest step when Angélique opened her door without a sound, and looked over the balustrades at him: she had either been in bed, or was ready for bed, for a long white night-dress was only covering her body, over her husband's room. Approaching the table on which his drink for the night was set, she removed the stopper from the carafe, and emptied into it the whole contents of a bottle she carried. At this moment the head Servin approaching: he was ascending the stairs, she saw the reflection of the light he carried on the ceiling of the room. She could not regain her chamber unperceived, but remembering that she had pulled her door close as she came out, she darted toward a large closet in her husband's room, laid with her head concealed, and opening the door of one of these, stepped lightly in.

She had scarcely shut the door upon herself when Servin entered the outer room and shut himself in. She saw the latter secure and fortify against which hung from the pegs, and cautiously settling herself into an endurable position, could hear Servin making use of drinking his coffee. Presently Monsieur Tiquet began to mumble indistinctly, and to toss his arms and head. Again the heavy bed-lurches became audible, shortly-uttered words; at length a fierce delirium came on. Servin took his master's hand; it was like fire to the touch. The sick man called for drink, and Servin, who had taken especial care in the preparation, hastened to give him a portion to his surprise found the carafe per out of the carafe!

Now he distinctly knew that he had replaced this stopper; a slight circumstance had impressed the fact on his mind; it had fallen from his hand upon the table, and had made a noise which had startled his master from his first sleep.

He laid down the half-filled glass and filled another with great care, which he immediately drank eagerly. Then, going into the corridor, Servin went to Angélique's door; it was closed, but not latched, and he pushed it to touch. For he was nearly out when he looked in, but, as his eyes became used to the half-darkness, he saw that the bed coverings were turned down, and that the bed was unoccupied. He called to his mistress, supposing that she might be in the dressing-room, but when no answer was returned he came back. He was sure that Angélique had entered her husband's chamber while he was first absent. She had hidden under the heavy valance of the bed, and examined every portion of the furniture under or behind which she might be. Last of all, he went to the closet, and, as if by instinct, pulled open the leaf of the wardrobe and drew aside the pendent robe of office, under which the guilty woman lay.

Her eyes met his, and without a word she rose and stepped from the hiding-place to the floor.

"Madame, you have broken the agreement. You can not deny me if I now take the measures to prevent any injury either to my master or myself. You must not leave this room till the physician, for whom I shall immediately send, shall have said whether or no there be poison in the carafe the stopper of which I know was put in by me, but which I found on the table."

The most abject entreaties succeeded Angélique's first speechless astonishment. Servin was deaf to prayers. In the rage which quickly supervened, when she flung herself on him in her endeavors to escape, her strength was no match for his; yet the struggle was long before he at last got her into the closet, which had no window, and there locked her in.

As soon as he had done that he proceeded to awaken one of the non-servants and send him for the physician. His master was alarmingly worse; his thin voice was raised in fearful screams; his whole frame was agitated by vain struggles to get up.

"Did you dare to kill my beautiful wife?" he asked.

"Lie down, Monsieur. I assure you that Madame is safe. She prefers to await the doctor's opinion in your wardrobe closet; she is too much agitated to come near your bed."

The physician arrived at him, as if trying to comprehend his words, and then, with a heavy sigh, sank back exhausted. Down was breaking when the doctor arrived. Having first attended to the patient, who was quiet, though still wandering in mind, he listened while Servin detailed his suspicions and the causes which had aroused them, and finally produced the carafe, filled with clear amber fluid, at the bottom of which a white sediment had settled.

By noon on the ensuing day all Paris was in a ferment. The intelligence was in every mouth that Madame Tiquet, for an attempt upon her husband's life, was in prison and awaiting trial. The Chevalier Mongeorge, also, who had been until near midnight at the Hôtel Tiquet, was under arrest, and so was Angélique's maid. The girl had in her terror confessed all she knew, which was not a little. She declared that her mistress had frequently gone, accompanied by her, to the convent of Cattelain, whence she brought sometimes powders, sometimes liquids, which she told the girls were essential to Catelain's mother taught them to prepare. But the woman had watched, and had seen her mistress put portions of these things into the beer of an Ancona wine, and into the egg-vessels of birds; and they had all died. On one occasion the girl had been ordered to put some soup which stood in a bowl on her mistress's table, but had only taken one or two mouthfuls, when the lady came in, and vigorously emptied the bowl, saying the remaining contents of the basin. The maid was terribly ill for two days after that. At another time Angélique had sent the girl to Catelain's on a sealed letter, on receipt of which the man had declared her a lucky child, who one more year, but duced. It had been full when she gave it to her mistress; now it was empty. Catelain had said to her, "Be discreet, my child, and you know what a great lady you yet may be. Some day, soon, that old fox Tiquet will die, and I shall marry Madame. We shall find you a good husband and money." She had believed him to be jesting, and had laughed; yet now he had seemed angry, and told her to make haste home.

When she gave the bottle to her mistress the latter had insisted on it. Although to the last she denied all, and although she would not have punish all my enemies and make myself free. Have a cure that you do not offend me." The girl had then asked her mistress to take philanthropy" and On which she replied, "Enough to prevent half a dozen men from ever feeling a headache again. Something to give Monsieur Tiquet's asthma and jealousy at one draught." This had occurred five or six days before the attempt upon his life, although she knew that it was poison which Catelain had sent. On the day after the scene above described she had been ordered to bring the bottle she must tell some one of what she knew, for it lay on her conscience; on which Angélique had made her swear to keep it secret: telling her that if she did not do so she should have some of the poison herself. She had sworn, and had received punishment on her own head, for she was now in the eyes of the law as criminal as herself. This, she said, had been the first time that Monsieur Cattelain was arrested. In his house were found heaps of various drugs, including Spanish flies. She also said he had poured what he had given her, was a preparation of arsenic and aconite, which the physician who attended Monsieur Tiquet knew to be the same that was contained in the carafe of night drink.

Angélique, who quite recovered her audacity and self-possession, resisted all entreaties to confess her crime, avowing that pleading should endure her falsely to condemn herself, and cast a stigma on her child. She declared that the whole charge was a conspiracy between Servin and the maid, who had an intrigue together; that Servin had ruled his master before marriage, was jealous of her influence, and had made away with the writing rid of her. The torture by water was applied to her, but she bore its agony with firmness. In the same chamber Cattelain was stretched on the rack, and for some time bore the torture without shrinking; then, as the executioner was about to unbind him, he suddenly cried out, "Stop, I will confess. He avowed that Madame had promised to marry him when her husband should be dead, that the girl Servin was jealous of Mongeorge, he had meant to poison that person as soon as he could find an opportunity.

It was plain that Mongeorge, who had been arrested, was not implicated in the affair. Cattelain and he was at once set free. He immediately repaired to the Hôtel Tiquet, and enforced admittance to the prisoner. She received him with tenderness, though prostrate with shame and grief. To him Mongeorge confessed that he loved Angélique, and would marry her again if she left her husband would aid him to endeavor to procure her freedom. The woman, though in her despair, saw in his wicked wife was strong, and Mongeorge drew up in his presence a petition, which he signed. Then the chevalier departed to the Palace of Justice, King, with whom he was a favorite.

It was of no avail: the King was kind in manner, but inflexible. The crime of poisoning had fearfully increased, and he was advised, must arrest to by example. Angélique's trial must be brought to justice. Moreover, Mongeorge's relatives, who were of great consideration, having learned that the chevalier had begun his love-passage for Angélique, had been beforehand with him, and had brought that the law might be enforced. Thus, during the whole course of the trial, Mongeorge sent him from Paris, that he might not be in the way to intrigue and plead for his mistress's release. Perforce, Mongeorge departed; but in a few days, an old man, emaciated almost to a skeleton, his hair white, his limbs tottering, was conducted by a gray-haired valet, demanded audience of the King. The petitioner held up one hand a lovely little girl, and, on being presented to the King, fell upon his knees, made his little daughter, kneeling also, join her hands in supplication for the mother's life. The King raised him and embraced the child, but assured him that pardon was hopeless.

The day of trial came. The most untroubled innocence could not have displayed an eye more cloudless, a brow more unruffled, than Angélique's. Her dauntless tresses were, as usual, being arranged in clusters of heavy long curls, crowned with a chaplet of white roses. Her robe of pure white was confined at the waist by a cincture of turquoises and diamonds. Madame de Romoret, who had escaped on the first alarm of her uncle's detection, had been apprehended, and Angélique knew nothing of this until she saw her aunt led into court, a prisoner like herself. Cattelain, who was carried in to give his evidence, fired when he saw the other prisoner, and declared that it was she who had taught him to prepare the poisons, and who had counseled her niece to administer them. Sentence of death was passed on all three. The waiting-maid was pardoned in consideration of her voluntary confession, but condemned to refine for life in the convent of St. Agathe. Cattelain managed to drag himself to the feet of his mistress and implore her pardon for having criminated her. "I forgive you, my poor Cattelain," she said; "it was pain which forced you to belie yourself and me. Let those who have compelled the false confession be answerable for it to God."

Although every one was certain of Angélique's guilt, she had been tried upon the ground of her beauty and by her fortitude extended far and wide among all classes in France. To add to the drama-ticism affect of trial, by a strange coincidence it happened that the judge who condemned her was her former lover, Henri St. Chaubert. She listened, without flinching, to the sentence of death pronounced, and then looked up at him with a smile, saying, loud enough to be distinctly heard by all, as, overstricken was the silence in the court, "Ah! Monsieur St. Chaubert, is that you? Formerly our petitions were reversed; you were the trembling culprit, I was the judge. I hear your sentence to-day with more courage than you heard mine." St. Chaubert turned deadly white, and was obliged to lean back in his seat. For many minutes he could not control his feelings.

Redoubled efforts were made to procure Angélique's pardon, but the King refused to receive any petitions in favor of the prisoner. Although to the last she encouraged herself with the idea of ultimate escape from her terrible doom, the day of her execution found her prepared to submit calmly to the sentence of death. Dressed as she had been at her trial, and accompanied by her aunt and Cattelain, who officiated as a priest who vainly implored her to confess, she was borne on a cart through the streets of Paris, exposed to the gaze of thousands upon thousands. She bore it unmoved, and her only anxiety seemed to be that her lovely hair should not be cut off as part of her toilet was to be. That was falling. When she reached the place of execution, she said, peremptorily, to the priest:

"Cease, Monsieur l'Abbé; permit me to die in peace. Give my love to my husband and daughter. Tell Monsieur Servin that I shall be with him in the foul compromise which has brought me to this; and to the Chevalier Mongeorge give my remembrance, and say that, if it must be cut off. So now, farewell, for I will hear no more!"

Her companions in crime suffered first. In a few minutes, too, she ceased to live. The excitement passed description. Women, and even men, fainted and shrieked, many fell and were trod down to death. The smallest lock of her hair sold for a large sum. As for the wretched president, the tortured by public life, and, living, a life of detriment seclusion with his child, placed her, when a child under only, in a convent of the Sacré Cœur, where she ultimately took the veil, about a year before her father's death.

Of the principal actors of this true history, the worst was surely that which the honest bookseller and jeweler gave to his little child when he first fully suffered the foul-hearted woman who became his murderess to drop her poisonous words into her ear.

A HEAD OF HAIR FOR SALE.

"Bur, Monsieur, it is very little."

"I confess it is little, but, probably, the sum I offer is very significant."

"So, Monsieur, my hair is not a good color to wear a dainty rich lace cap, and it is very long (the gentleman's mouth watered, for she unbound it, and it fell under her waist). Surely, Monsieur, you will give me more than thirty francs?"

"On my word, Mademoiselle, I could not offer you a sou more. The hair is very beautiful; I admit, but in effect the article is a complete drug at present. Trade is dull, very dull, and I assure you, Mademoiselle, I shall be for it. Keep it, Mademoiselle, until the times improve. And besides, it is a pity that you should part with it at all."

(The perquisite saw that the poor fish was ravenous, and he had hardly need to play his meagre line. The gentleman's air appeared indifference, but he had at that moment in hand a commission from an aged child of fashion who would have given a pretty income for a small flow of hair like that of the deprecating daughter of need.)

"Ah, well, Monsieur, if you are very hard, but I must take the sum you offer."

There was only a thin partition between us and the hard bargain was long concluded, and we could tell by the sharp click of the perruquier's scissors that the purchase was being effected. Presently the girl entered like shop-obliquely, and through the thinly-veiled window of the screen was seen to lay down a large but distinct voice, as if to herself, "But I am still pretty."

"And so you are," thought we, as we inwardly exclaimed, "the perruquier must temper its wrath to your condition, poor child!" and took up our small purchase, and glanced at them. There was something in her manner and her meagre gentility of dress which told us that she was on an errand of self-sacrifice; and we felt a sympathy for her which we forgive the curiosity which tracked their protegée to her holy of holies!

We had a long walk, but her pace never flagged. Starting from the Avenue de Marigny, threading rapidly the crowded pavements of the Faubourg Sainte Honoré, passing over the Champs Elysées with a single glance at the luxurious equipages thronging the avenue up the Rue de Chaillot, and through the dingy streets leading to Passy, she at length entered a house which appeared as though it had long been a victim of the Court of Chancery. Against the dust-ridden and blistered door-post we saw carelessly lounging a card, which seemed as though itself was growing sallow with long-deferred hope, inscribed with the words "appartements meublés." It was a shallow pretext, but we rang the bell, and our summons was deliberately answered by a portentous, whose ancient limbs seemed grating with the rust of years and inaction.

"You have apartments to let, I believe?"

"Yes; will Monsieur condescend to enter?"

"Thank you, (the Rubicon passed). On what floor are they?"

"Ist rez-chaussée, Monsieur, and they are very comfortable." We did not quite like the quiet here, although not far from the resort of fashion, but we do not child in the house mauvais.

Monsieur, now that the ice was broken, ventured to ask if the young lady who had just entered was a lessonee.

"Oh! Mademoiselle Marie, yes, Monsieur. Her mother is sick to the death, but Mademoiselle is a good child, a very good child, though Monsieur knows how the poor thing bears it. The Virgin must have her reasons, and carries the poor child through her struggles."

The wine had now arrived and assisted in welcoming our plot. Madame Lauvrié would have a small glass (we did not fear its strength, and poured her out a tumbler), and it gave more freedom to the conversation.

"Stay, mon cher," said she to her grandchild, "there is Madame in the evening."

The little "cabbage" eyed the franc piece we gave her with a glance of intense satisfaction, and replied, "Madame is worse, grandmamma. She is excited, too; oh! so excited with Mademoiselle Marie."

"It is so, poor child, and why is she so excited?"

Only because Mademoiselle has had her hair cut; but it is no shorter than mine." (The little "cabbage" was pulled as close as a child in a Dutch picture.)

We saw that the time had come for making a clean breast of it, so we detailed to Madame Justine what we had witnessed in the perruquier's shop, and hoped that Madame would point out any way in which a friend could serve her lodgers. Madame Lauvrié grows Iugubrious under the stimulus of our faithful ally, the Médoc, but she found suitable expressions of our sympathies, and it required some explanation to reassure her.

"Monsieur," said she, "is very good, but Mademoiselle and her mother are very proud. They would starve before they would receive charity from a stranger."

"Are they so proud that they would reject the sympathy of a friend? Is there no way of aiding them without wounding their self-respect?"

"They are dead to those who should receive their love, and they shrink from the pity of strangers. Monsieur, Mademoiselle and mother their history." Justine then gave us the following narration:

Marie's father was an only child, and of a good family, and was educated for a physician. He was sent to Paris to study in the hospitals, and, like many other young men under similar circumstances, he became gay in his living. "But," he be stronger than ever before you will be able to walk out with me."

As we entered, Marie looked at us as if striving to recall our features, and then whispered to her mother that a doctor was in attendance. We passed over to the bedside of the sick lady, and saw that Marie was right. Her hair would be stronger than ever before her mother would be able to walk out with her.

The poor lady seemed exhausted by recent exertion; but in a short time she rallied, and murmured, "I feel it is too late, my darling; may Heaven repay your devotion!"

Marie looked at us inquiringly. We took the sick woman's hand, and felt that the pulse beat feebly. Her mind began to wander in a light and unconnected manner, and her eyes were growing dull, and dallying with vacuity. We saw that the patient was suffering from the reaction of her late excitement; but we were conscious that a few hours more would hand her over to the grave, and we could only give her a little stimulant. Marie's eyes intuitively read our verdict, and we saw the big tears rapidly chasing each other down her cheeks, while she gently smoothed the sufferer's pillow, and whispered words of hope which it cost her agonies to affect.

After a little while the poor lady seemed a little to revive, and Marie became almost importunate with her tender offices; but she was interrupted by the entrance of the "little cabbage," who stole quietly into the room, and whispered a few words to Marie.

"Tell Monsieur," said the latter, "that we can not see him now. Will he call again?"

"Grandmère has told him that Madame is very ill, but he says that his business is urgent," replied the cabbage.

The conversation was carried on in a whisper, but Madame caught the purport. Her eyes brightened with a feverish brilliance, and she said, in a voice strong for her,

"What is that, my child? Let Monsieur enter —who knows?" The last two words were uttered in a lower tone than the rest, as though they were the result of some thought flashing across her mind.

We stood passive. For although we knew the irruption of an urgent visitor was a matter of serious apprehension, we were aware that the duration of the poor lady's existence could at worst be effected by but a few hours, and we met the glance of Marie with a silent assent. The "little cabbage" disappeared, and in a few moments returned, ushering in a tall man, far gone in years, whose demeanor stamped him as belonging to the higher ranks of society. He was clothed in deep mourning, and his face, which must have been handsome in his youth, was expressive of considerable haughtiness, overlaid and softened by the traces of painful suffering. We offered to withdraw, but Marie wished us to remain, and the stranger did not object. As he moved across the room to the bedside of Madame, we whispered her perilous condition, and that he looked up from her mother's side imploringly.

"Mamma is very ill, Monsieur," said she.

"I am grieved to hear it," rejoined the stranger, in a low, tremulous voice, not unmusical.

At the sound of his voice, Madame, who had fallen into an attitude of rest, made an effort to raise herself upon her arms, and looked steadfastly into his face as if seeking to recall something from the past. The stranger observed the effort, and spoke again in his low, nervous tone—

"Madame does not know me."

"I have not that pleasure, Monsieur," said she, with apparent diffidence of her memory.

"You are Madame St. Auliers; and this," pointing to Marie, "is your child."

A HEAD OF HAIR FOR SALE.

"You are right, Monsieur. What then?"

"It is also my name," he replied, and he paused as if waiting for the effect, or to master his feelings.

Madame's eyes lighted up as if by the kindling of an inward fire. A superhuman effort of will gave her momentary strength, and with almost a spring she raised herself in her bed, and, looking fixedly at the stranger, exclaimed,

"I see, it is true, you are the father of my husband—"

"And I am come to ask that the past may be forgotten, and to offer my regrets and my assistance. Will you accept them, and allow me to take up my duties as a parent?"

There was something like a glow of happiness on the flushed face of Madame as she glanced toward Marie, and rejoined,

"Be it so, for his child's sake. For me it comes too late. We have struggled long, and you have been very hard, Monsieur."

"My son was disobedient, and I was proud, but I am humbled; for I am left alone, and have long sought my lost child. Let those of us that remain speak only of the future."

These words were broken in their utterance, and it was evident that the speaker was suffering from violent emotion. Marie sat listening to the dialogue without uttering a word. Her face reflected the pleasure felt by her mother at this late reconciliation; but it was veiled and darkened by the anxiety she felt for her dying parent. Her arms were tenderly twined round her mother, like a vine around the decayed tree which the next gale shall lay prostrate. She gazed wistfully in her mother's face, and once almost fancied that the new hopes which had dawned upon their prospects had imparted fresh vitality to the sinking frame within her arms, but the illusion was only transitory. Mortality had gathered its supporters together for one last grand struggle with the champion of immortality, and the victory remained with the powers of the spirit world. Ere her grandfather had done speaking, Marie felt a shiver pass through the frame of her mother, which was the precursor of death. Her arms were suddenly called upon for additional support, and she gazed with a terrified look upon the bloodless cheeks and closed eyes of her mother, and then silently appealed to us. We saw that the sufferer had ceased to suffer, and that the angels were about to lead home another fugitive from its earthly prison; and we unwound the poor girl's arms from the almost breathless clay.

The patient was soon beyond the reach of worldly ministration. Her pulse ceased to indicate the presence of life, and the brightest mirror would have passed unstained over her mouth. She was gone; and we retired from the presence of the grief that was too holy to be witnessed by a stranger.

When we descended we found Justine all anxiety regarding the patient and her visitor. She scanned our features with an almost ludicrous mixture of curiosity and earnestness, and, with a volubility considerably accelerated by the remnant of our second bottle of wine, her questions followed each other with the haste of a flock of sheep with a dog at their heels.

"Was Madame better? Was Monsieur, the visitor, an old friend? Did Mademoiselle comfort herself tranquilly?"

We answered the first question in its order of precedence, and a single expression took possession of her face.

"Great God! and is it so, Monsieur? And Mademoiselle—"

"Is with her grandfather," we rejoined.

"Did Monsieur say 'her grandfather?'"

We replied in the affirmative.

"I see; Heaven is in much mischief of its own. Then Monsieur will care for her, and the thorn lamb shall not be driven out into the wilderness," exclaimed Justine.

We promised to call next day to inquire after Marie, and we kept our word. The wrinkles in Justine's cheeks seemed to have very recently been the channels of an unwonted flow of water, which, in subsiding, had left the usual tide-marks on the banks. Mademoiselle, said she, had passed a wretched night. She had been desolate, inconsolable; but Monsieur, son grandpère, was prodigal of his sympathy, and the poor child was growing more reconciled to her loss.

"After the funeral," said Justine, "they will retire to the château of Monsieur, where Marie is to take the place of her deceased grandmère in the household. But I know not how long this arrangement will last," continued she, "for events crowd in rather thickly at present. Marie has received by this day's post a letter from her affianced, who is recovered, and about to return home to establish his health. He is a captain of his regiment now, and will not quietly submit to see his favorite concept becoming the follower of another.

A few days subsequently we received a handsome mourning ring from Marie's grandfather, accompanied by a note containing warm but unearned thanks from herself, and we have treasured both until now as mementos of one of the most painful incidents in our professional career.

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XX.

As between the man who achieves greatness and him who has greatness thrust upon him there lies a whole world of space, so is there an immense interval between one who is the object of his own delusions and him who forms the subject of delusion to others.

My reader may have already noticed that nothing was easier for me than to lend myself to the idle current of my fancy. Most men who build "castles in Spain," as the old adage calls them, do so purely to astonish their friends. I indulged in these architectural extravagances in a very different spirit. I built my castle to live in it; from foundation to roof-tree I planned every detail of it to suit my own taste, and all my study was to make it as habitable and comfortable as I could. Ay, and what's more, live in it I did, though very often the tenure was a brief one; sometimes while breaking my egg at breakfast, sometimes as I drew on my gloves to walk out, and yet no terror of a short lease ever deterred me from finishing the edifice in the most expensive manner. I gilded my architraves and frescoed my ceilings as though all were to endure for centuries; and laid out the gardens and disposed the parterres as though I were to walk in them in my extreme old age.

THE EXPLOSION OF THE PROPELLER "GLOBE," AT CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, ON NOVEMBER 8, 1860.—[SEE PAGE 742.]

This faculty of lending myself to an illusion by no means adhered to me where the deception was supplied by another; from the moment I entered one of their castles, I felt myself in a strange house. I continually forgot where the stairs were, what this gallery opened on, where that corridor led to. No use was it to say, "You are at home here. You are at your own fireside." I knew and I felt that I was not.

By this declaration I mean my reader to understand that, while ready for any romance or a story devised by myself, I was perfectly miserable at playing a part written for me by a friend; nor was this feeling diminished by the thought that I really did not know the person I was believed to represent; nor had I the very vaguest idea of antecedents or surroundings.

As I set out in search of Miss Herbert these were the reflections, and, indeed, occasionally asking myself, "Is the old lady at all touched in the upper story? Is there not something Private Asylum-ish in these wanderings?" But still, apart from this special instance, she was a marvel of acuteness and good sense. I found Miss Herbert in a little arbor at her work; the newspaper on the bench beside her.

"So," said Miss Herbert, looking up, "you have been making a long visit up stairs. You found Mrs. Keates very agreeable, or you were so young?"

"Is there any thing wrong hereabouts?" said I, touching my forehead with my finger.

"Nothing whatever."

"No fancies, no delusions about certain people?"

"None whatever."

"None of the family suspected of any thing odd, or eccentric?"

"Not that I have ever heard of. Why do you ask?"

"Well, it was a mere fancy, perhaps, on my part; but her manner to-day struck me as consistent strange—almost flighty."

"And on what subject?"

"I am scarcely at liberty to say that; in fact, I am not sure that I should be," said I, mysteriously, and somewhat gratified to remark that I had excited a most intense curiosity on her part to learn the subject of our interview.

"Oh, pray do not make any impudent revelations to me," said she, pettishly; "quite apart from the indiscretion, would have the singular demerit of affording me not the slightest pleasure. I am not afflicted with the malady of curiosity."

"What a blessing it is!" I said. Now, I am the most inquisitive of mankind. I feel that if I were a clerk in a bank I'd spend the day paying into every account, and learning the private estate of his balance-sheet. If I were employed in the post-office no terror of the law could restrain me from opening the letters. I feel that any one has a secret in his heart, and I feel I could cut him open to get at it!"

"I don't think you are giving a flattering picture of yourself in all this," said she, peevishly.

"I am aware of that, Miss Herbert: but I am also one of those who do not trade upon qualities that have any pretension to."

She flushed a deep crimson at this, and after a moment said—

"Has it not occurred to you, Sir, that people who seldom meet except to exchange ungracious remarks, would show more judgment by avoiding each other's society?"

Oh, how my heart thrilled at this pettish question! "Miss Herbert," said I, solemnly, "be sure I knew she loved me, for we never met without a quarrel." "I have thought of that too, Miss Herbert," said I, "but there are some observances to be kept up, conventionalities to be respected."

"One of which, however, require that you should come out and sit here while I am at my work," said she, with unprecedented passion.

"I came out here to search for the newspaper," said I, taking it up, and stretching myself on the grass, proceeded to read an article.

She arose at once, and gathering all the articles of her work into a basket, walked away.

"Don't be hurt this way, Miss Herbert," said I, incidentally; "any where else will suit me just as well. Pray don't go." She made no vouchsafing to utter a word, or even turn her head, she continued her way toward the house.

"The morning she stepped out for Vevay," Hans, "filled the measure of my folly, for I then saw she could not control her feelings for me." This passage recurred to me as I lay there, and I hugged myself in the thought that such a moment of delight might yet be mine. The profound German explains this sentiment well. "With women," says he, "love is like the idol worship of an Indian tribe; in the moment their hearts are bursting with devotion, they lift a stone and mould and mutter to their god. With them is the ecstasy of their passion."

I now saw that the girl was in love with me, and that she did not know it herself. I take it that the sensations of a man who suddenly discovers that the prize of his has been admitted to participate in his attentions, are very like what a head-clerk may feel at being sent for to the house and informed that he is now one of the firm! This may seem a commercial formula to employ, but it will serve to show my meaning, and as I lay there on that velvet turf, what a delicious vision spread itself around me! At one moment we were rich, traveling in splendor through Europe, amassing art-treasures wherever we went, and despoiling all the great galleries of their richest gems. I was the associate of all that was distinguished in literature and science, and my wife the chosen friend of queens and princesses. How unaffected we were, how unspoiled by fortune! Approachable by all, our graceful benevolence seemed to elevate its object and make of the recipient the benefactor. What a world of bliss this vile dross men call gold can scatter! "There—there, good people," said I, blandly, waving my hand, "no illuminations, no bonfires—your happy faces are the brightest of all welcomes." Then we were suddenly poor—out of caprice just to see how we should like it—and living in a little cottage under Snowdon, and I was writing, Heaven knows what, for the periodicals, and my wife cooking a little turtle in a pipkin, when the mail-coach awoke by kissing, each pretending that it was all the other's fault, that we ratified a peace on the same footing. Then I remembered the night, never to be forgotten, when I received my appointment to the Legation—why should I rob her of what she has herself called the proudest episode in her life? Are not, as the moralists tell us, all our joys shared? Why, then, object to this one that is my only lost for a few days? Let us suppose it only to endure through our journey, and the poor old soul will be as happy, never caring for the fatigues of the road, never fretting about the innkeepers' charges, but delighted to know that his royal highness enjoys himself, and sits over his bottle of Chambertin every evening in the garden, apparently as devoid of care as though he were a beggar-man!

I can not say how it may be with others, but, for myself, I have always experienced an impatience more than usual to read a rôle, whenever it personated somebody else; I felt as though I had left the man Potts at home to rest and refresh himself, and was playing as another gentleman: just as I might have spared my own palate by putting on a friend's coat in a themed-out storm. "Let me have a little repose; I felt it would be good for me. As to the special part allotted to me, I'll just as an obliging actor plays Hamlet or the Cock to convenience the manager. Mrs. Keates likes it, and, I repeat, I do not object myself."

It was evident that the old lady was not going to communicate her secret to her companion, and with this was a sudden access of satisfaction to me. Whatever delusions I threw around Miss Herbert I invented myself, and as I had chosen in which I would invest myself to her eyes, my personal prowess, coolness in danger, skill at all manly exercises—these with a large range of general gifts and acquirements, I meant to accompany me through all time, and I am a sufficient believer in magnetism to feel assured that, by imposing upon her I should go no small part of the road to believing myself, and that the first step in any gift is to suppose you are eminently suited to it, is a well-known and readily acknowledged axiom. Women grow proud from looking in the glass; why should not men grow brave from constantly contemplating their own courage?

"Yes, Potts, be a Prince, and see how it will agree with you!"

CHAPTER XXI.

MRS. KEATES came down, and our dinner that day was somewhat formal. I don't think any of us felt at our ease, and, for my own part, it was a relief to me when the old lady asked me leave to retire with her coffee. "If she should feel lonely, Sir, and if Miss Herbert's company would prove agreeable—"

"Yes," said I, quickly, "that young person will find me in the garden." And therewith I gave my orders for a small table under a great spreading ash, and the final accompaniments of my after-dinner hours, a cool flask of Chambertin. I had not drained above more than two-third of my Burgundy before Miss Herbert appeared. It was not that the hour hung heavily on me, or that I was not perfectly comfortable enjoyment, but, somehow, I was beginning to feel chafed and impatient at her long delay. Could any possible explanation be anticipated as the propriety of being left alone with a young man? Had she heard, by any mischance, that imprisonment placed me under the Habeas Hand? Had Mrs. Keates herself resented the cool style of her companion's morning manner-order? "I wish I knew what detains her!" cried I to myself, just as I heard her step on the gravel, and then saw her coming, leisurely fashion, down the walk.

Determined to display an indifference the equal of her own, I waited till she was almost close; and then, rising languidly, I offered her a chair with a gesture of the handsomest, while I listlessly said, "Won't you take a seat?"

It was growing dusklish, but I fancied I saw a smile on her face as she fell over down.

"May I offer you a glass of wine or a cigar?" said I, carelessly.

"I thank you," said she, with gravity.

"Almost all women of fashion smoke nowadays," I continued. "The Empress of the French smokes this sort of thing here, and the Queen of Bavaria smokes and chews."

She seemed wholly unheeding this, and said nothing.

"As for myself," said I, "I am nothing without tobacco—positively nothing. I remember one night—it was the fourth sitting of the Conference—that Count Sardinian fellow, you know his name, came to me and said—

"'There's that confounded question of the Danubian Principalities coming on to-morrow, and Gortschakoff is the only one who knows any thing about it. Where are we to get at any thing like information?'

"'When do you want it, Count?' said I.

"'To-morrow, by eleven at latest. There must be at least a couple of hours to study it before the Congress meets.'

"'Tell them to bring in ten candles, fifty cigars, and two quires of foolscap,' said I; 'and let no one pass this door till I ring.' An ten minutes to eleven next morning he had in his hands that memoir which Lord C. said embodied the prophetic wisdom of Edmund Burke with the practical statesmanship of the great Commoner. Perhaps you have read it?"

"No, Sir."

"Your tastes do not probably incline to affairs of state. If so, only suggest what you'd like to talk on. I am indifferently skilled in most subjects. Are you for the theater? I am ready, from Dante to the Bigelow Papers. Shall I be artful? I know the whole thing from Stemming and his long-nosed saints, to Leech and the Fanchists. Make it antiquities, agriculture, racing, dress, the drama, pedestrianism or cock-fighting—I'm your man; so go in, and you'll be always sure that you'll discomfit me."

"I assure you, Sir, that my head would attach for more naturally to my own insufficiency."

"Well, well," after a pause, "there's something in that. Macaulay used to be afraid of me. Whenever Mrs. Montagu Stanhope asked him to one of her Wednesday dinners, he always declined if I was to be there. You don't seem surprised at that?"

"No, Sir," said she, in the same quiet, grave fashion.

"What's the reason, young lady," said I, somewhat sternly, "that you persist in saying 'Sir' on every occasion that you address me? The use of that ceremonial that should subside between us is marred by this Americanism. No pleasant interchange of thought dwells in the charming feature of equality. How is this?"

"I am not at liberty to say, Sir."

"You are not at liberty to say, young lady?" said I, severely. "You tell me distinctly that your manner toward me is based upon a somewhat which you are not revealed?"

"I am sure, Sir, you have too much generosity to press me on the subject of which I cannot, or ought not, to speak."

That fatal Burgundy had got into my brains, while the already delicately shaded temperament, and if I had been substituted to the thumb-screw now, I would have died one of the Orleans Martyrs. "But I have promised," said I, "and I have been fortunately, or unfortunately, brought up in a class that never tolerates contradiction. When we ask we feel that we order."

"Oh, Sir, if you but knew the difficulty I am in—"

"Take courage, my dear creature," said I, blending condescension with something warmer. "You will at once be reposing your confidence where it will be worthily bestowed."

"But I have promised, not exactly promised, but Mrs. Keates enjoined me imperatively not to betray what she revealed to me."

"Precious secret!" cried I, "she has not surely communicated my secret—she has not told you who I am?"

"Oh, I can assure you most solemnly that she has not; but being annoyed by what she remarked as the levity displayed for that, in truth no task this evening, and without intending it, even before she knew, dropped certain expressions which led me to believe that you were the very highest in rank, though it was your pleasure to travel for the moment in this obscurity and disguise. She quickly perceived the indiscretion she had committed, and said, 'Now, Miss Herbert, that an accident has put you in possession of certain circumstances which I had neither the will nor the right to reveal, will you be so kind as to continue the favor to employ this knowledge in such a way as may not compromise me?' I said, of course, that I would; and having remarked how she accidentally—accidentally, perhaps—used 'Sir,' in addressing you, I deemed the imitation a mere jest, while at as constantly acted as a sort of monitor over myself to repress any relapse into familiarity."

"I am sorry for all this," said I, taking her hand in mine, and employing my most insinuating of manners toward her. "As it is, I am thunderstruck that I should ever resume the station that once pertained to me; as, in fact, I had fortune to enjoy the title in the rest of life an humble and lowly condition, my ambition would have been to draw toward me in that sense and way such sympathies and affections as might attach to one so circumstanced. But now that I resume an obscure name, cast out some unfrequented spot, and there, with the love of one—not only—solve the great problem, where true happiness is not sure to be the denizen of the thatched cottage as of the gilded palace. The first requirement of my scheme being, that my secret should be as in my keeping. One can steel his own heart against vain regrets and longings; but one can not secure against the influence of those sympathies which come from without, the unwise confidences of zealous friends, the hopes and wishes of those who read your submission as mere spathy."

I paused and sighed; she sighed too, and there was a silence between us.

"Must you not feel very happy and very proud," thought I, "to be sitting there on the same bench with a prince, her hand in his, and he young man with his confidence in her ear? I can not fancy a situation more full of interest."

"After all, Sir," said she, calmly, "remember that Mrs. Keates knows your secret. I have not the vaguest suspicion of it."

"And yet," said I, tenderly, "it is to you I would confide it; it is in your keeping I would wish to leave it; it is from you I would ask counsel as to my future."

"Surely, Sir, it is not to such inexperiences as mine you would address yourself in a difficulty?"

"The plan I would carry out demands none of that crafty argument called 'knowing the world.' All that acquaintance with the by-play of life, its conventionalities and exactions, would be sadly out of place in an Alpine village, or a Tyrolese Dorf, where I mean to pitch my tent. Do you not think that your interest might be persuaded to track me so far?"

"Oh, Sir, I shall never cease to follow your steps with the deepest anxiety."

"Would it not be possible for me to secure a lease of that sympathy?"

"Can you tell me what o'clock it is, Sir?" said she, very gravely.

"Yes," said I, rather put out by so sudden a diversion; "it is a few minutes after nine."

"Pray excuse my leaving you, Sir, but Mrs. Keates takes tea at nine, and will expect me." And, with a very respectful curtsey, she withdrew, before I could recover from my astonishment at this abrupt departure.

"I trust that my royal highness said nothing indiscreet," muttered I to myself; "though, upon my life, this hasty exit would seem to imply it."

Dandruff.

BOSTON, OCT. 20, 1859.

MESSRS. JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.:

Gentlemen,—I have used your Cocoaine about six weeks, and its effect is so marked and extraordinary that I deem it my duty to make it public.

My worst complaint for several years has been Dandruff, with itching and irritation of the scalp. After brushing my hair, my coat collar would be covered with the white scurf resembling fine flour sifted like a shower of snow.

I have tried many various applications without effect. His share of the Consolidated Fund, which, however, is not expected to exceed 2½ per cent.

I have used less than a bottle. The dandruff, and the irritating state of mind it, have entirely disappeared, and my hair was never before in so good condition.

Your obedient servant,
A. A. FULLER.

Baldness.

BOSTON, November 24, 1859.

Gentlemen: When I first used your Cocoaine, I had been bald seven years. In the mean time, I had tried a dozen different preparations, especially recommended for baldness (and all claiming to be infallible), without the slightest effect.

The ladies of my household urged me to try your Cocoaine, which I did, to please them, but had very little faith in the power of man to restore my hair. I have used the contents of one bottle, and the pain and pain is covered all over with young hair, about three eighths of an inch long, which appears fine and healthy, and is rapidly increasing.

In a word, your Cocoaine is excellent—the best preparation for the hair I have ever known, and the only one which accomplishes more than it promises.

You may use it as you please, and add my name.

Yours very truly,
D. T. MERWIN.

MESSRS. JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston.

Loss of Hair.

BOSTON, July 19, 1857.

MESSRS. JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.:

I can say with truth and sincerity, that, in my own case, your Cocoaine has done all that you claim it to do. I was fearful of losing my hair, and had actually lost a become gradually more and more thin, so that I could not touch it without pain. This irritation, and that I used your Cocoaine, and in a few days the irritation entirely disappeared, and my hair has never before in so good condition.

By the advice of my physician, I have now had about your process of purifying the Oil, I commenced to use the last week in April, and have almost stopped the itching and irritation; in three or four days the redness and tenderness disappeared entirely, and the hair is fast coming now a thick growth of new hair. I trust that other similarly afflicted will be induced to try the same remedy.

Yours, very truly,
SUSAN R. FOPE.

Irritation of the Scalp.

WATERVILLE, ME., Sept. 15, 1860.

MESSRS. JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.:

Gentlemen,—I deem it but just to state to you some of the benefits I have derived from the use of your Cocoaine. For a long time, I was troubled with the typhus fever; after my recovery I found myself troubled with a severe irritation of the scalp, which had continued to increase very much, and to aleviate it I had failed to find a remedy.

Having used your Cocoaine about a week, I purchased a bottle only for the purpose of a fair trial. Before I had finished it, I had entirely overcome the irritation of so long standing. Deriving so much benefit from its use, I take pleasure in recommending it to others who may be afflicted in the same way, and it has wholly eradicated the disease.

JOSEPH HILL, Jr.

Burnett's Cocoaine. The following are lately received from Frank Leslie, the well-known proprietor of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper:—

NEW YORK, Sept. 22, 1860.

J. BURNETT, ESQ.—Dear Sir: For a long time past I have been using your Cocoaine, and think it far preferable to any thing I have ever used for the hair.

If my endorsement is of any value, you are perfectly at liberty to use it. Respectfully yours,

FRANK LESLIE.

In the February Number will appear the first part of a New Story by W. M. THACKERAY, which, it is expected, will be continued in successive Numbers during the year.

The Article on "Washoe" in this Number is the first of a Series of Papers portraying Life and Character in California and Oregon, by J. ROSS BROWNE, late Confidential Government Agent for the Pacific States. They will be profusely illustrated with Drawings by STEVENS, MCLEAN, CRAPSEY, and FARNHAM, from the Character Sketches by the Author.

Other Illustrated Papers, depicting Life, Character, and Scenery in every part of the American Continent, from Labrador to Florida, are in course of preparation by favorite Authors and Artists.

The Publishers trust that the thousands of Voluntary Correspondents by whose aid the Editors have been able to make the HARPER a marked feature of the Magazine, will continue their favors; and that new Correspondents will put forward such anecdotes and facts as come under their observation.

CHARLESTON SCENES.

We continue our series of Views at Charleston with a fine picture of the old Custom-house, which serves as a post-office at the present time; showing also the only Palmetto-tree which still survives in the streets of Charleston.

The building itself has quite a history, and rises into classical dignity among the sons of the soil. In the basement of this fabric old Moultrie walled up some 100,000 pounds of gunpowder, in order to keep it from the British, when the town was about to fall into their hands, in the third attempt which they made for its capture; and here it remained safe from discovery during the three years that they had possession. The vaults of this same basement were employed as a Provost or prison, in which the captured rebels were locked up for starvation or execution, or when it was necessary to work upon the fears of friends, and extort submission or property. In these damp, dismal regions hundreds perished of privation and their wounds. Here Isaac Hayne, the martyr, was held in durance vile till taken out to the gallows. You note that chamber to the left in the rear of the second story? In that chamber did the noble victim make his toilet the fatal morning. He had been brought from the cells below to this apartment in order that he should habit himself properly for his doom, and exchange the last garment with his friends. This old fabric, associated with so much that is grateful to patriotism, the Charlestonians will hardly suffer to be pulled down to make way for structures of even greater excellence. It is beautifully situated, and might be employed for various public purposes when it is withdrawn from present uses.

Our smaller pictures need no description. The grave of Gates stands in the shade of the walls of Fort Moultrie; the palmetto sighs overhead, and the waves murmur within hearing of the last resting-place of the broken-hearted chief.

Fort Sumter is one of the forts which guard the entrance to Charleston harbor. In case of any trouble, it would become a place of marked importance.

FANCY VERSUS FACT.

A VERY mixed-up sort of a matter is this life of ours. It is a good deal upon the plum-pudding plan, which, with its plums and soft, succulent spots, has likewise its hard crust, which is the character of the material of which teeth are made.

So in this life we have now sunshine and then a storm—now a lover and there a bereavement. Such intertwisting is there that we can rarely stop to pick the rose without giving the thorn a chance to find its way to the quivering nerve. And not only is there this tangling up of affairs that are in themselves unlike, but the same event or circumstance has as many different aspects as there are ways of looking at it, or eyes with which to see it. A poet said long ago:

> "From out the self-same cloud
> One rose a thousand angels look and smile,
> Another sees so many demon forms."

Neither should we frown upon this baloney power of fancy. The ability to take away from the earth its earthiness is one much to be desired. A good and finish are thus given to life that else were wanting altogether. And when this power of transformation is denied, there is a thing stunted and stubborn, ly declares itself to be earth-born—it is wonderful how this same fancy avenges itself by looking at it through its own glass, which separates the rays of light, and weakens the low-born object in brilliant prismatic colors. There are few things more certain that fancy can not contrive to throw a halo around them which will be visible to the eye adapted to the medium. But this power of transformation seems to be most easily exercised upon distant objects. It is difficult for us to appreciate cares and troubles which are entirely outside of our own experiences. The poor man looks at the lordly dwelling and elegant appointments of his rich friend, and conceive of no more paradisiacal state of existence. The latter is not troubled as to the way in which he shall get the daily bread necessary for his wife and children. Rugged, hard-handed labor makes no demand upon him, and therefore surely he is blessed. While, in the eyes of the rich man, it is the humble inmate of the cottage who has the blessing. To him the simple lot of the laborer seems easy, when compared with the stress and strain which must come upon the brain of him who has large possessions, and, consequently, large cares and responsibilities.

The child regards the man with envy, and longs to reach the delectable state, when he can do as long as he pleases at night, go where he lists by day, and pay no attention to his mother's wish, without being himself in danger of being chided or having his ears boxed for his folly.

The man looks back to his childhood, when care had not yet laid its heavy hand upon him, with longing, and says, "Would I were a boy again!" He forgets the broken nose, the bruised shins, the hard lessons, the reprimands, the refusals, the disappointments and crosses which so often clouded the sun and cut it out from the view of his young eyes.

"I wish I were a woman," said a little five-year old maiden the other day, "then I would eat as much pickle as I wanted!" If the little maiden live to be a woman, she may look back with a fond desire to the time when she could eat any pickle at all with impunity.

"Love in a cottage" has been "flattering unction" to the hearts of love-sick maidens in all time. But the sweet realities of looking out washing, dressing and seething, dish-washing and scouring, chopping and eating, all jumbled up together, and going on in company at quick successions, have been universally wrought out the disenchantment of those who were possessed by the notion. We are very much inclined to the poets for the encouragements in which distant prospects are so often clothed. "Hope deferred" is one of their favorite topics. Even glowing and sowing are made poetically attractive. But let a man follow the plow all day, until every muscle complains of weariness, and the sun might paint the clouds, at evening, with every various shade of gold and amber, and make them gorgeous beyond any pencil's power, and the mind of the weary man would have scarcely enough vitality left to rejoice in the beauty of the hour, unless it were because the setting of the sun was a signal that his day's weary work was over with.

Again, these poets tell us, in musical numbers, of the melodious effect of the lowing herds, that always contrive, by some way or other, to get into exactly the right place at exactly the right time, which is generally the evening hour. But the lowing is pleasanter to be heard of than to be heard. Most persons, after a first trial, would prefer to take it second-handed. At vesper time let there "come off" a concert after some such programme as this. Let the bass be given by a brace of oxen that have just had permission to rest from their labors, the alto made up of the plaintive tones of a disconsolate cow, while the soprano is given by a newly-weaned calf. Few, probably, would have the hardihood to execute at the end of the performance. Even the wife of a bereaved mother, upon the tender flesh of whose offspring he may have dined that day, would probably satisfy the longing for this kind of music of the most rural of poets—even Corydon himself.

Likewise, these same poets often become impressively eloquent over "the bleating of the lamb." Beautiful maidens and angelic children, whom Heaven in mercy reclaim as its lawful property, which has been "strayed or stolen" for a while, are made to long for an extension of the lease of life, in order that, among other privileges, they may again hear this delightful "bleating of the lamb." The unfeeling exiles have the benefit of such a performance as greeted my ears "once on a time," they would soon declare themselves ready to go!

One morning in June a whole flock of these woolgrowers strayed from their humble premises to my place, and manifested a decided inclination to eat their lunch just under my chamber window. They chose to be sociable while dining, instead of imparing their digestion by hurrying through their meal in solemn silence, as do many of their "betters."

Ba! began Nanny-black-shep; Ba-a! chimed in her horned admirer; Ba-a-a! echoed the tiny voice of a newly-arrived darling of the flock. This fuguing done, the chorus became general. A lamb that seemed disposed to be a soloist was, of every soul of them abundantly able to carry a part. My ears tingled for a week afterward; and even now the very thought of a sheep raises an imaginary noise and confusion.

The painters add the poets in creating our pleasant delusions. They can idealize and make attractive the commonest and most vulgar institutions in this commonplace world. Take, for example, as "The Farm-Yard" of the English Herring, that most unpoetic of all flesh and blood environments, the hog is really made quite attractive. I thought, as I looked at the picture, that a comparison between the tidy, Sunday-go-to-meeting-looking swine and its ugly brother, the unwashed brethren according to the flesh, would certainly be odious to the living. Not only were the general style and air of the former in their favor, but likewise their dignified silence, when contrasted with the unmannerly grunting of the latter. Pure as they emerged from the troubled waters of the gutter, where they have just performed their washing ablutions, they have not the slightest expectancy for the corn and conglomerated tea that are to make their breakfast. As justice is due to pigs we will not at present improve the opportunity here afforded to make a suggestion in answer to the charge of general unsanitariness so often brought against the individuals in question. This accusation is, I believe, founded mainly upon their occasional appearance in the streets, which is the often manifested intention to go the other way.

The latter attribute being found to prevail quite extensively among human beings in this country, a very respectable place in society, will not be considered here. The first count in the indictment will be, therefore, passed.

Every body knows that these pork-manufacturers, though they are strictly speaking, in a called sedentary, are not active in their habits. At the same time, they are generally blessed with good appetites, of which, as they are not denied, they are quite piggish in the indulgence. Now putting these two facts together, what wonder if these much-maligned individuals be often stimulated, as far all the horrors of indigestion which, any dyspeptic being pursuit, would be an excuse for any amount of grunting whatsoever!

Again, the cows in the picture, how attractive they looked as they arrived at the brook with mud! The meditative look in the eye seemed to say, "Here much we ruminate as much we may." No fear with an inexperienced hand gaffing up her hoops and cross to the opposite side-walk to avoid the cows so gravely and well-behaved as those. As the milk-maid standing there, "on the wrong side of the cow," is evidently an amateur in the particular business of "promoting the watering-idler." There is no smell of the kitchen about her. One might search a long while among the actual Bridgets and Julys without finding a genuine article that was half so much to one's taste. She is evidently not acting a character, and the affectation looking swain who has many of cows "just for chance," is making her forget what she came for.

Blessings be to the artist who has given us for these "crumbs of comfort" which they strew in our path! Life were cheerless without them, and this earth a barren and ungainly dwelling-place.

THE BANK CRISIS.

THE banks of the city of New York, taught by experience, have frankly met the present emergency by consolidating themselves into one institution, throwing their specie into one common fund, and offering the merchants whatever assistance they need. In 1857 they undertook to fight the merchants, and, as they might have expected, were worsted in the conflict. In 1860 they are to the merchants: We will stand or fall with you. We will discount for you to the last dollar we hold among us. Here are twenty millions of gold: so long as a dollar remains, we shall be found ready to grant our usual facilities to dealers.

It need hardly be added that the present attitude of the banks is nobler and safer than the policy of 1857. An antagonism between banks and merchants can not but be fatal to the former; while the bold confidence exhibited by our banks at present is calculated, if any thing can produce such a result, to allay the fears of the timid and restore courage to the public. The twenty millions of gold now held by the New York city banks—and which will soon be swelled to twenty-five millions by receipts from various quarters—can not be taken out of the country, because the foreign exchanges are uniformly in favor of the United States. It can not well be taken out of New York, because all parts of the country are at present tributary to New York. There is a small profit on shipments of coin to New Orleans and Mobile; coin is coming from New England; there is a large profit on remittances of coin from New England to New York. If it be taken out of the banks at all, it must be placed in private repositories in this city. How unlikely an event this is, those who remember the panic and 1857 will testify. In 1857 some very timid people took gold out of the banks, thinking it was not safe there. When they had got it and had it home in their keys, like the man with the elephant—they did not know what to do with it. Large amounts of gold in private houses were a terrible provocation to burglars; frightened new depositors and possessors of specie knew no peace until they had restored their gold to the banks. If this was the case in 1857, when withdrawals in coin amounted to half a million of dollars, how unlikely it is that twenty millions could be withdrawn!

We can not undertake to say what may be the result of the present commercial crisis. It is a new event in our history. There is no precedent to guide men's judgments concerning it. But there are certain points of difference between the present crisis and that of 1857 which deserve to be carefully noted and remembered.

On 1st October, 1857, when the quarrel between the banks and their customers began to wax warm, the banks had loaned out $105,935,499 on a basis of $11,400,413 in specie, and $92,796,955 in deposit. Now they have loaned out $123,260,000; but they hold $19,600,000 in coin, and $76,000,000 in deposits. Therefore, they are able to expand now how they were then. Moreover, in October, 1857, foreign exchange was selling at a price which caused specie to flow freely to Europe; the banks were obliged to protect themselves as well against the foreign drain as against a run at home. Now foreign exchange sells at a price which prevents it profitable to import specie from Europe; the banks are certain, if they need it, that, in the course of thirty days they will be paid the remittances of bullion from England. Again, in October, 1857, the amount of money required by needy borrowers in this city was enormous. Every railroad corporation was carrying a large floating debt; including the manufacturing and other public companies of New England, it is no exaggeration to say that the corporate borrowers in the markets had paper afloat to an amount not less than fifty millions of dollars. This was excessive of individual borrowers, of whom, as statistics proved, there was a vast multitude living, trading, and speculating on money borrowed at high rates of interest. Of these loan-mongers many disappeared. Some have gone to their last account; many have compromised with their creditors. The railroads have been sold out by the sheriff; a few have recovered their footing and paid up. They have all, or very nearly all, vanished from public view. Our merchants have small or no floating debts; our merchants are sailing under close sail; the general expansion of credit is in quite another line. This is another point in favor of 1860. Finally, during the three years previous to 1857 extravagance in living had been almost universal throughout the country. Not in New York alone, but in the Western cities as well, people of all classes had been spending unusual sums in luxuries of every kind—building preposterous palaces, filling them with preposterous furniture, giving preposterous entertainments, paying preposterous wages to servants, clothing their families in preposterous silks, and generally living on a preposterous scale. Now, on the contrary, the people of this country have been generally living economically for the past three years. In the West, especially, poverty is only just departing from the households of the country people. Since 1857 the people of the North have spent less money in luxuries than they did in a single year prior to that date.

These points of difference are likely to exercise some influence on the pending crisis. They tend to show that both the merchants and the banks must be stronger now than they were then. And they must, at the proper time, form a very suitable basis for a restoration of confidence, now so sadly disturbed.

AFFAIRS IN CHINA.

IT is reported, as a rumor, that a treaty of peace has been signed between the Maritime Powers of Europe and the Empire of China. If England and France are satisfied with any written treaty with the Chinese, and do not obtain material guarantees for its honest fulfillment, they are doomed to disappointment, and the war will soon be renewed afresh. It must always be remembered that Chinese ethics are not our ethics, and that a Chinaman considers it no wrong to cheat a party with whom he deals. This is true of Coolie porters, and of every class of Chinese, so the highest court officials and the Emperor himself. To lie and to deceive are not crimes in the eye of Chinese morality. Lord Elgin and Baron Gros and Baron Gros withdraw their forces from China on the strength of a mere written treaty, signed at Pekin or elsewhere, they will have lost their time.

This country has taken no part in the war with China. We are a good deal in the habit of leaving our citizens residing abroad to the care of Providence and the British cruisers; we have done so in China. Some of our papers and politicians say that in so doing we showed our superior wisdom, and that our masterly inactivity will avail us better than the blundering exercises of the British powers. This may or may not be. Under the favored nation clause, we shall reap the benefit of any concessions which the European powers extort from the Chinese, without sharing their outlay. Whether our people will stand as well with the Chinese authorities is another question. This country is destined, in the not very distant future, to have more extensive dealings with the Chinese than any other nation. They must eventually become, not only the carriers of wood and drawers of water, but the traders of our Pacific States. In the course of the next twenty-five years the immigration of Chinese to this country will probably far exceed the immigration of Irish and Germans. Perhaps, under the circumstances, we may thus reap the benefit of having allowed others at present to discharge the duty of whipping the Chinese into common sense and a decent respect for other nations.

THE LOUNGER.

A WET DAY AT THE FALLS.

IT was a wet day, dark, lowering, gray, and chill; but the roar of the Falls all night long had warned us what we were to look for. If you have been at Niagara out of season upon a sunny day, you may imagine how desolate a wet day must be. In fact, there is nothing to charm or interest a stranger for a moment but the river below and the cataract. The village, when the Cataract and International are overflowing with gay crowds, when carriages and pedestrians throng all the avenues, in every variety of mask of Gout Island, there is a young woman in kid gloves exclaiming, "Isn't it beautiful!" even then the village is a mere caricature of the long, monotonous line of dark woods are sad and dispiriting; but in the rain!—open a wet November day!—and that is desolation.

Somehow you are more entirely at the mercy of the hackmen in the late autumn, for the great houses are closed, and every stranger is marked by the coaches for persecution. Sallying forth as we felt quite competent to behold the wonder of the continent, we were immediately accosted by a crowd of fiebus. They offered to take us every where in the smallest sum of money. "A carpet bagger, gentlemen, for a dollar and a half." "Only the drive, gentlemen; open air—nothing's a shilling apiece." "Gentlemen, have a carriage this morning?" And so a dozen, first confidentially, then loudly—then stepping, from behind, from the other side of the way, from the seat of the carriage—voices every where, drowning the roar of the Niagara—"Carriage, gentlemen; nice carriage, gentlemen: take you all for a shilling." Why do these people leave their homes to understand their business? If a man wants a carriage he is very sure not to take the one of the driver who follows him up so faithfully.

We left them at length, all but one who walked by our side elaborating the advantages of employing him, until we asked him if he proposed to accompany us, at least to do so silently. Some few stragglers were also left from backmen at corners, and backmen reaming restlessly about upon their carriages, hanging their hopeless legs over the side of the seat, and hailing us in such a hope-lens voice, that we knew they were not disappointed by the invitation "No, thank you."

When you stand upon the bridge over the American rapids, the backmen trouble your ears and your memory no more. You see only the ocean pouring out of the sky and sweeping beneath you; you hear only the mighty roar of the cataract. Then you have to run the gauntlet of an Indian-ware shop; but at last you are safe upon Goat Island. If it be a chill, wet November Sunday, you may be sure, as you turn to the left and walk along the shore of the river and lake, that you will walk with only your own company. Pinching the purple berries of the cedar in your idle fingers, you look wistfully up the lake, already feeling the magnetism which draws you toward the great plunge. As each counter toward it, and see the Canadian rapids, that feeling of profound pathos which pervades the whole region begins to fill your mind. There are little islands, clumps of tangled trees near the margin of Goat Island, and between them and you the shooting water eddies, coils, and sparkles, the trees leaning over, the boughs sometimes dipping, the swift water never delaying, but grimly, terribly rushing on to the brink. Those secluded passages—shadowed, gleaming, winding, and narrow—till, perhaps, remind some eyes for from the home across the sea, of the rivers of Scotland, sweet in story, and you shall believe, as you listen, that you are looking upon the Yarrow, the Esk, the Tweed, in their wild and wanton exuberance.

Just beyond, the mist above the great cataract rises above the trees. Irresistibly your feet quicken their pace, you catch half glimpses; the air shakes with the throbbing; listen on, and the catastrophe, of fate, of despair, steals over your soul—and there you are, standing upon the verge on the naked cliff, with the white abyss below you. If you have seen it many times, every time it is grander.

But if you would be overwhelmed, cross to the Canada side; go easily to Table Rock, then down the new steps, and from the spot where once was the loose stones quite to the river's edge, and you have the entire fall above you. The water dashes up in spray, like ocean billows, over the rock on which you stand, and the vast cloud of vapor half conceals the cataract.

A WORD UPON NOVELS.

Now that Dickens has begun, and Thackeray is about beginning a new novel, it is curious to think about story-telling, and see how the novels let us into the secrets of life. It is universally agreed that if we were all honest the world would be a paradise. Yet few of us say just what we think, for we assume just what we are. Probably we are all often conscious of asking ourselves, when talking with other people, "I wonder what kind of person he really is, behind all the broadcloth, and lace, and artificial flowers, and conventional smiling, and chatting, and bowing, and monotonous answering that he is saying there."

It takes a sharp crisis often to show a man what his neighbor really is; or, as the keen-eyed old Greek philosopher compelled the Lumia to show that she was a serpent and not a woman. And the same crisis reveals him also to himself. And the social fights often gives a paralytic the use of his limbs. Thus the world constantly appears to the imagination, and reappears in poetry and fiction, as a vast masquerade, where we are all dancing in dominoes, and now and then assume a sudden grimness through the windows, and a frightful thunder-clap overcomes the music, to show who really has nerve and who hasn't.

Novels are so universally entertaining, because they are pictures of the masquerade with a key or explanation of some of the principal figures.

"Do you see," says Mr. Dickens, as we stroll through the masquerade, "that large, bland, bald, benignant-looking man, with huge round eyes and in a full suit of bottle-green broadcloth, sitting over there, idly fluttering his pudgy hands and twiddling his fat thumbs, the very personification of patriarchal benevolence? He looks like a great human turtle-dove, as he walks all the cardinal virtues upon spontaneously, and flourish as luxuriantly as cabbages in grass—doesn't he? Well, that man's heart is as bald as his head. His benevolence is merely an edipose deposit. He is really a thin, sour, selfish, hard-hearted man. He is the living skeleton masquerading as Jack Falstaff."

The other novelists are other cicerones. They are illustrators of life. If, for the early and sharp-sighted, you can not do better than listen to them. If they really can not see, the world discovers it for them, and tells them so.

ON THIS SIDE AND ON THAT.

LOUNGING along, the other day, at the rate of about three miles an hour, I presently came to the shores of a river which separated two countries. The train stopped, and we all stepped out upon the platform. There was an air of bustle and alertfulness. People rushed hither and thither, asking for others, or various kinds to inquire about luggage and tickets. There seemed to be a thoughtful supervision any where, and every thing was at sixes and sevens. The station was the very kind of huge shed, with stone walls, perhaps, but it was uncomfortable and shiftless in appearance; and after much delay, the train moved slowly over the river into another country.

Stopping at a station there, it was impossible not to observe the general tidiness and convenience of the whole building. It was of a simple and appropriate style of architecture; the platform in front was very broad and spacious; a conspicuous and legible sign projecting from above every door indicated precisely the use of the room and directed the eager traveler. Every thing was swept and garnished. The station was a temple of convenience and neatness. The area about it was carefully inclosed in proper fences; the ground was decently kept. The sitting-rooms were entirely comfortable; smoking was forbidden, and the floors were not covered with the juice of tobacco. The station looked as if somebody earned it, was responsible for it, and had a pride in it. Travel immediately became a pleasure.

Now think at a venture of any station in our large towns. Begin with the Albany terminus of the Central Railroad; follow on to Schenectady, to Utica, to Rome, to Syracuse. You had better pause at Syracuse, and do homage to the Company that provides so spacious, so stately, so clean, so convenient a hall for passengers to dine in. Compare it, dinner and all—compare it, in the very least detail, with the Hamilton Station, upon the Great Western road. Then you will see what is a really good station, worthy the nineteenth century, and what is a reality. It was just like the Western road, however, disputes the palm of inferiority with the New York Central. The subterranean abyss under the City of Elms into which the trains shriek with despair, as they rush, is perhaps the most wretched of all the railroad retreats in the country.

However, why should we complain? If they don't like us, they need not come. And, after all, we are very likely to break our necks upon the way; so it comes to much the same thing. And yet, would it not be interesting to see some adventurous enterprise of the large kind carried out handsomely and tastefully? Is it impossible? Or of course it is better that passengers should be transported safely than that they should be able to see when they have been cheated. But are the two things absolutely incompatible?

And echo distinctively answers, No.

"UNTO THIS LAST."

UNDER this droll and characteristic title Mr. Ruskin is printing a series of papers in the Cornhill Magazine, which are simultaneously produced in Harper. The title is drawn from the words in Matthew xx. 14: "I will give unto this last as unto thee," and the object is to show that our political economy is founded upon a false principle. The papers are full of quaint and brilliant brilliancy, and their doctrine is impregnably true. So long, he says, as you base your wishes upon your selfishness so long you are sure to go wrong at last. An individual may escape the result, but a state or a nation will be sure to discover it at length.

It would be a curious and interesting business to show how accurately true this is historically; and to ask the secret defects of nations in all systems of injustice. Buckle denies that popular prejudice is ever permanently unjust; but Buckle would find it hard to show that material methods were not mastered by the moral sentiments. Any tool, any machine, any invention, which is of service to society depends upon the brain that constructs it; and the character of that control will be determined by the character of the constructor.

Buckle's own country of England confirms this truth. The English system of society is essentially unjust, and therefore it is constantly subject to disease consuming its vitality. The wealth of England is as false as it is great. It is the wealth of a few, and while all the time it seems to be larger, it is really weaker; and when it is so large as to be unwieldy, and to be divided by a civil struggle it falling more and more into the hands of great proprietors. The population is rapidly dividing itself into the very poor and the very rich. The condition of the poor, in every way, is utterly wretched. Ignorance, vice, and misery are increasing to distinguish these classes more than ever. Olmsted, in his "Walks and Talks of an American Farmer in England," has shown that the English preservation and acute insight and judgment which put his works of travel among the most valuable of their kind in literature—that this man has left the most degraded people of which the politicians and many thinkers in England have any thought whatsoever. It is a cloud already larger than a man's hand. But it is either not seen or despised, or simply feared that those dangerous eyes and hopes that the delage may hold off until itself gets out of the scrape.

Sydney Smith wrote a comical paper upon taxation in England: but now, after all the taxes which he describes have been imposed, and more, the Englishman, comes the Income Tax to squeeze the dry sponge. "When we are bled to death," said an Englishman, the other day, "they will turn to and garrote us." After all the "rates" of every kind have been paid, the income of the Englishman is taxed still more, and nothing can be found. And it is a notable fact that the amount of the Income Tax for the current year is greater than the war expense in China. Meanwhile, also, the thrifty population of the Highlands in Scotland has diminished enormously within a century, and its place is not supplied.

No thoughtful man can hope that the unsided multiplication table or the Rule of Three can save England; nor can any man deny that she has reached her present situation in strict obedience to the laws of the present political economy. The drift of Ruskin's series is to prove that this must be changed. He does not, indeed, put quite by his doctrine especially to his own country. But it is the only remedy. When you have produced certain results by disregarding great bodies, obedience is all that remains. It may not save you, but it will surely help those that follow you.

A LETTER TO THE HOST OF A COUNTRY INN.

MY DEAR LANDLORD,—I have lately passed some time at your house. You haven't the least idea who I am, and the reader will have no idea who you are. So we can talk plainly, and nobody need be offended.

Now, then, why don't you have your floors and walls clean at a fair price? It wouldn't cost much to have the floors and the doors and the mop-boards scrubbed every day. Suppose you have to pay wages for two or three women, you would find your account in the increased patronage of your house.

Then why do you allow such a table-cloth as we had at breakfast the first day to be laid upon your table? Had you no self-respect? Have you no pride, no honor in your house? You remember the table-cloth? It was simply filthy! It was spotted and smeared with the greasy gravy of that fried beef-steak. People had slopped their coffee upon it, and their tea; and the maids had slopped the dishes; and the butter had had a chance at it; and it was mottled and variegated with stains of every shape and hue. The cloth was perfectly nasty, dear landlord! Don't you think you could do something about it? If you would take it off altogether, and have the table scrubbed clean, that would answer.

The paper on the wall of the dining-room tobore and wall is ragged. It was just like the cloth upon the table. It was so discolored and streaked and foul that it was not a pleasant relief from the contemplation of the other. Also the wooden counter, or dresser, or whatever you call it, where the meats were carved. Is it a stroke of economy upon your part to have it of such an appearance that nobody cares to eat any thing which is carved upon it?

Think of your dining-room a moment. Imagine a clean floor, a clean table-cloth with clean napkins, clean paper upon the walls, a clean ceiling, clean dressers and counters, and rigorously clean hands and clean aprons upon the waiters—all this cleanliness, which would not be very expensive at first, would be infinitely profitable at last.

Then your house is a house of entertainment, of convenience for travelers, isn't it? They expect to have their own way, and not yours, don't they? They hope to take, and you mean that they shall take, their own in their own—don't that understanding? By what right, then, does that porter beat the Chinese gong at seven o'clock in the morning? Here is Mr. Sharp, who arrived only at two o'clock in the morning, and could not get fairly to sleep before three. Are Mr. Sharp's rights and comforts as a guest not to be consulted as much as those of any person in your house? And as if one such indecent case were not enough, there must be another at eight o'clock for breakfast. Suppose that Mr. Lazy does not wish to breakfast until ten. Is he not at home in your house? Is he to have his own way, or yours? Then why can't the porter put my boots quietly at the door without thumping to say that they are there? Of course they are there. Of course he is paid to take the boots and clean them and then back again. Why doesn't he do it quietly? He might as reasonably thump to tell me that he's taking them away—or thump to tell me that it's half past one o'clock, and that every body is asleep—or thump to tell me that the mercury is down to zero.

My dear Sir, why do you make your inn a Procrustes' bed, and compel every man to do what somebody else wishes? Mr. Sharp wishes to rise at six o'clock, why should Mr. Blunt be roused? If Mr. Blunt wants to breakfast at seven o'clock, is that any reason why Mr. Sharp may not wish until nine? If any body wishes to be called at any hour, by all means let him be called; but don't call the whole house. Turn's reason in all things. You need not fear that Mr. Sharp may not want to breakfast until twelve o'clock. The American will not wait until then. If, in rare cases, he does, let him have his breakfast at twelve.

You see, dear Landlord, more cleanliness and silence are what we all pray for. Then your fare might be as plain as you chose. We should not quarrel. In a word, then, Put your spoon in sign, "Dirt and noise warranted in this house;" and let nature's motto be, "A clean and quiet house." If the signs tell the truth every guest will be accommodated, and one of the two landlords will prove that he knows how to keep a hotel.

Your well-wisher,

THE LOUNGER.

SIMPLE SONGS FOR SIMPLE SINGERS.

I. Perverse.

I'm leaving thee in sorrow, Jane,
I leave thee deep-driven sigh;
A quiver, and I'm on my lip,
A tear in my eye:
And wouldst thou know me whence the pang
That sighs from my breast?
'Tis simply that I'm fearful
From my dear darling Jane!

I may no longer see thee,
The cab is at the gate;
The fare is ten-pence each, love,
If I should longer wait.
Farewell! the hansom calls me forth,
At six I'll come again.
And being perhaps fined to dine
With my dear darling Jane!

II. D'Abbeye.

I have always a welcome for thee;
And prithee what more can I say?
So look in some evening soon,
And then we will go to the play.
Or if you'd prefer, dear, to dine,
'Twill be equally pleasant to me:
Or say that you'll come to tea with me,
I have always a welcome for thee!

III. Si Sportels.

I am a merry, laughing girl,
As every one may see,
And I can keep my hair in card,
And I don't care for tea.
I've learnt to dance, to sing, and play,
As every lady should,
And if I promised to "obey"—
Now, that I never would!

A nice young man I lately met,
His name I may not tell,
And in the course of half an hour
He vowed he loved me well.
He danced sweetly, I confess,
He evenly set to you and good,
And if he asks me to say "yes—"
Why, I shall say I would!

A PAPER RIDDLE.—When Lord Ellesborough was Lord Chief Justice, a man was brought into court as a witness. When he came up to be sworn, he was asked by the clerk, "Are you a Christian, when you kneel?" The puzzled fellow at the court, it is your bounden duty to be sworn." "Then," said the man, "I am a Christian." "Then," said the judge, "I am a witness," if your lordship comes to that, I'm thinking I'm just as good a witness as your lordship." "What do you mean, Sir?" asked his lordship, angrily.—"Why, faith," said the witness, "I've come here in your working clothes, and I come in mine."

TIL YELL YOU BY-AND-BY.—"Patrick," said a Judge, "what do you say to the fact that you are guilty or not guilty?"—"Faith that is difficult for your Honor to tell, and since nobody else will I lave the evidence."

An attorney brought an immense bill to a lady for some business he had done for her. The lady, to whom he had once paid his addresses, murmured at the charges. "Madam," replied the limb of the law, "I wanted to convince you that my profession is lucrative, and that I should not have been a bad match."

An apothecary, not a little distinguished for his dispatch, visited his wife one morning in bed, and inquired of her when he knew to be a case of singular modesty, asked him, in the simplicity of a large romance—"Why the mischief did lived to such an extreme age?" To which the apothecary replied, "Because I always carefully took no physic."

At dinner, one day, Mr. Rogers related a story of a mercer gentleman who kept a fire-escape—a kind of sack, in which he would lower himself from the window. Being suddenly awakened one night by the sound, as he thought, of the window of his fire-engine, he saw a man actually knocking at the door, he descended in his sack in great haste, and vociferously called upon him to load his wife (who had been to the opera) out of her carriage.

A cowardly fellow, much given to apparent courage, or boasting of his valiant deeds, was, by some means, overtaken by a gentleman, received a violent box on the ear. Summoning his resolution together with all his remaining powers, it was meant in earnest. "You, Sir," replied the other, "have mistaken your man; had any other person struck you frightened him, turned away, saying, "I am glad of it, for I do not like to fight myself."

"Hello, driver, your wheel is going round!" sang out a little urchin to a carter, who was driving his heavy load through the street, the other day. A young lady who was employed in building a guard-chain for a gentleman's watch, was asked what it was for. "A bell-rope, Sir," replied she.

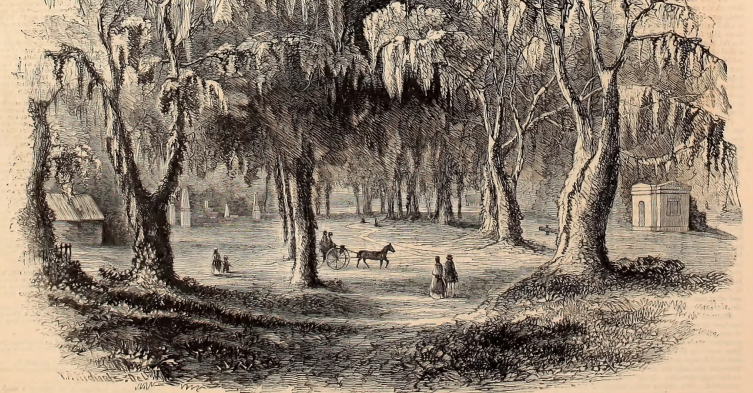
"Boy," said an ill-tempered old fellow to a noisy lad, "what are you hollering for when I'm asleep?"—"Why, father, I'm hollering for the devil boy," "what are you going by for when I am hollering?"



ENTRANCE TO BONAVENTURE CEMETERY, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

BONAVENTURE CEMETERY AT SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

WE publish herewith two beautiful pictures of Bonaventure Cemetery, about four miles from Savannah, Georgia. It is, perhaps, one of the most lovely cemeteries in the country.

Dr. Mackay, in his "Life and Liberty in America," says: "There is nothing like it in America, or perhaps in the world. Its melancholy loveliness once seen can never be forgotten. Dull, indeed, must be the imagination, and cold the fancy of any one who could wander through its weird and fairy avenues without being deeply impressed with its solemnity and appropriateness for the last resting-place of the dead."

Bonaventure was for years the residence of the Tattnall family, and is the birth-place of Colonel Josiah Tatnall—a prominent officer in the American Revolution, and subsequently Governor of Georgia. It was originally settled by Colonel Tatnall's grandfather, Colonel Mulnyne—an old English gentleman, who came out with the early founders of the colony of Georgia. This gentleman—and not Mr. Tatnall, as Dr. Mackay states—"though he came to a forest land where trees were considered a nuisance, admired the park-like beauty around the great country mansions of the nobility and gentry in his native England, and, while every one else in the colony was cutting down trees, made himself busy in planting them. Having built himself a house on the estate of Bonaventure, he planted an avenue, or carriage-drive, leading up to its porch, and the tree he chose was the evergreen oak (commonly known as the 'live-oak'), next to the cypress and magnolia the noblest tree in the Southern States. In due time, long after the good man's death, the trees attained a commanding height, and from their boughs hung the long, feathery festoons of the tillandsia or Spanish moss, that lends such melancholy beauty to much of the Southern landscape." In the shadow of the wild-wood around this place the Tatnalls were buried; but the place has passed from the hands of the family, and is now owned by W. H. Wiltberger, Esq., proprietor of the "Pulaski House," at Savannah, "who, finding the tombstones of the Tatnalls and others in the ground, had a portion set aside for the purposes of a public cemetery."

"Never," says Dr. Mackay, from whom we have already quoted extensively, correcting his errors—"never was a place more beautifully adapted by nature for such an object. The mournful avenues of live-oak, and the equally mournful glades that pierce on every side into the profuse and tangled wilderness, are all hung with the funereal drapery of the tillandsia. To those who have never seen this peculiar vegetation it may be difficult to convey an adequate idea of its sadness and loveliness. It looks as if the very trees, instinct with life, had veiled themselves like mourners at a grave, or as if the fogs and vapors of the marshes had been solidified by some stroke of electricity, and hung from the trees in palpable wreaths, swinging and swaying with every motion of the winds. Not unlike the effect produced by the tattered banners hung from the roofs of Gothic cathedrals as trophies of war in the olden time, or to mark the last resting-places of knights and nobles, is the effect of these long streamers pending from the overarching boughs of the forest. Many of them are so long as to trail upon the ground from a height of twenty or thirty feet, and many of the same length, drooping from the topmost branches of oak and cypress, dangle in mid-air."

THE NEW STATE HOUSE AT COLUMBIA, S. C.

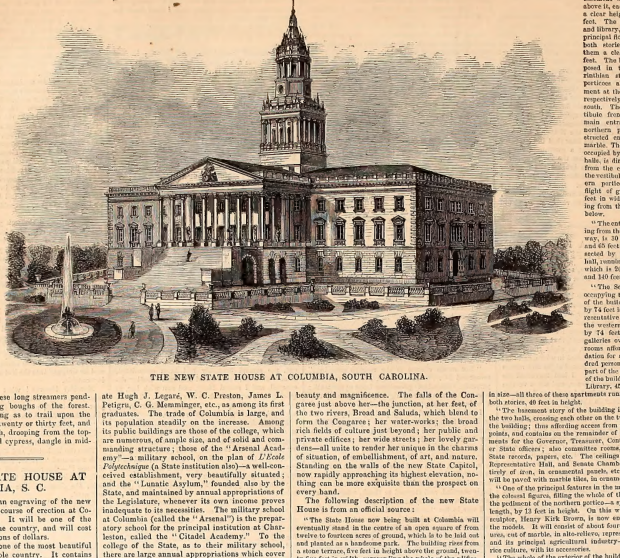
WE publish herewith an engraving of the new State House which is in course of erection at Columbia, South Carolina. It will be one of the finest State Houses in the country, and will cost something like four millions of dollars.

Columbia is probably one of the most beautiful inland towns in our whole country. It contains some ten thousand inhabitants; is not only the seat of Legislation, but of the State College—a venerable institution under the patronage of the State, which has sent into the field a host of Carolina worthies, among whom we need only enumerate Hugh J. Legaré, W. C. Preston, James L. Petigru, C. G. Memminger, etc., as among its first graduates. The trade of Columbia is large, and its population steadily on the increase. Among its public buildings are those of the college, which are numerous, of ample size, and of solid and commanding structure; those of the "Arsenal Academy"—a military school, on the plan of L'Ecole Polytechnique (a State institution also)—a well-conceived establishment, very beautifully situated; and the "Lunatic Asylum," founded also by the State, and maintained by annual appropriations of the Legislature, wherever its own income proves inadequate to its necessities. The military school at Columbia (called the "Arsenal") is the preparatory school for the principal institution at Charleston, called the "Citadel Academy." To the college of the State, as to their military school, there are large annual appropriations which cover the education and support of about one hundred beneficiaries.

Standing on the high banks of the "rolling Congaree"—here a river of rapids—Columbia surveys, all around her, a prospect of exquisite beauty and magnificence. The falls of the Congaree just above her—the junction, at her feet, of the two rivers, Broad and Saluda, which blend to form the Congaree; her water-works; the broad rich fields of culture just beyond; her public and private edifices; her wide streets; her lovely gardens—all unite to render her unique in the charms of situation, of embellishment, of art, and nature. Standing on the walls of the new State Capitol, now rapidly approaching its highest elevation, nothing can be more exquisite than the prospect on every hand.

The following description of the new State House is from an official source:

"The State House now being built at Columbia will eventually stand in the centre of an open square of from twelve to fourteen acres of ground, which is to be laid out and planted as a handsome park. The building rises from a stone terrace, five feet in height above the ground, twenty-five feet in width, surrounding the whole of the edifice, and ornamented by a stone balustrade. The building is cruciform in its plan; its extreme dimensions on the major axis, running east and west, being 365 feet in length, and on the minor axis, from north to south, 172 feet; with a height of 68 feet from the ground to the top of the cornice, and is divided into a basement with two stories above it, each of which has a clear height of about 18 feet. The legislative halls and library, situated on the principal floor, run up through both stories, thus giving them a clear height of 40 feet. The building is composed in the Roman-Corinthian style, with two portices above the basement at the centre, facing respectively north and south. The receding vestibule front, forming the main entrance from the northern portico, is constructed entirely of white marble. The principal floor, occupied by the legislative halls, is directly accessible from the exterior through the vestibule and the northern portico, by a grand flight of granite steps 80 feet in width, and ascending from the stone terrace below.



"The entrance hall, leading from the principal doorway, is 30 feet in width, and 65 feet in length, intersected by the connecting hall, running east and west, which is 20 feet in width, and 160 feet in length.

"The Senate Chamber, occupying the eastern end of the building, is 44 feet by 74 feet in size; the Representative Hall, being in the western end, is 62 feet by 74 feet in size, with galleries over the retiring rooms affording accommodation for some three hundred persons. The central part of the southern portion of the building contains the Library, 45 feet by 82 feet in size—all three of these apartments running up through both stories, 40 feet in height.

"The basement story of the building is intersected by the two halls, crossing each other on the two main axes of the building; thus affording access from the four cardinal points, and contains on the remainder of the floor apartments for the Governor, Treasurer, Controller, and other State officers; also committee rooms, and vaults for State records, papers, etc. The ceilings of the Library, Representative Hall, and Senate Chamber are to be entirely of iron, in ornamental panels, etc. All the floors will be paved with marble tiles, in ornamental patterns.

"One of the principal features in the main front will be the colossal figures, filling the whole of the tympanum of the pediment of the northern portico—a space of 90 feet in length, by 13 feet in height. On this work the eminent sculptor, Henry Kirk Brown, is now engaged preparing the models. It will consist of about fourteen colossal figures, cast of marble, in alto-relievo, representing the State and its principal agricultural industry—the cotton and rice culture, with its accessories.

"The whole of the exterior of the building is constructed of granite of very superior quality and beauty, which is brought to the building by a railway, constructed expressly for the purpose, from the quarry, about three miles distant, and lying directly on the bank of the Congaree River."

CZAR. EMPEROR FRANCIS JOSEPH. REGENT OF PRUSSIA.

ROYAL MEETING AT WARSAW, OCTOBER, 1860.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE ROYAL MEETING AT WARSAW.

We publish herewith an engraving of the meeting of the Emperors of Austria and Russia and the Regent of Prussia, at Warsaw, a few weeks since. The meeting was summoned by the Emperor of Austria, who, evidently, sought aid and counsel from his co-despots in the straits to which the Italian Revolution and the Hungarian uprising have reduced him. It is no secret that his idea was to reorganize the Holy Alliance, which proved so disastrous to human liberty after the battle of Waterloo. Whether he would have succeeded, had the conference been uninterrupted, remains a question; the meeting was, unfortunately for his hopes, broken up by the death of the Empress Dowager of Russia. Since then we hear that the Emperor Francis-Joseph has sought a guarantee for his Italian possessions; also, that the Emperor Alexander of Russia assured his brother, the Emperor Napoleon of France, that nothing had been plotted against him at the conference. But all this is mere guess-work. The Emperors and the Regent met, and separated, but what they really said and did no one knows.

THE STORY OF A BRITISH RELIEVING OFFICER.

ONE November afternoon, several years ago, I had established myself in the station of relief for the day, and prepared to go home.

It was dark when I left the Union Office to walk to my home, which was about a mile out of the town. The last part of my way lay through a little piece of field, which had an evil character in the neighborhood. The reason I could never exactly learn; but the story went, that in that field, once at least in every year, at night time, there appeared a female figure clothed in white, and that from this apparition there issued sighs and moans most grievous to hear. I had traversed the field at night hundreds of times, and not a vestige of any female in white had I seen; so I was, of course, as much above all this as the latest vestry. I had just stepped over the stile, when—I must confess, not without a very unmanverable sound of deep sobbing came distinctly to my ear. I really do not see why I should not own, further, that my heart gave a most decided kick as I paused about to see the cause; and that when, a few yards off, I could perceive a white figure making toward me, I felt it was unusual perspiration ever spread my forehead.

It was a woman, all in white, too, and crying bitterly.

"Now, Mr. Jones, don't be such an errant fool," said I to myself, as I half turned to retreat. At the same moment down fell the figure on the grass. I went to it. It was no spectre, but a poor woman, evidently ill, and in great trouble. As I elicited from her that she had set out from her cottage, a little distance off, to seek her servant, who had left her some hours before to go into town. Questioning a little more closely, I discovered that this disturbance (for she was one of the class to which they lived was completely secluded, and they had only been there a month, so that they were quite strangers to the neighborhood. The servant had sallied forth to-day, unknown to her mistress, to obtain relief, having no notion, poor creature, of the inquiry and examination requisite before assistance could be given. I further learned that the sufferer's husband, who, five weeks before, had sent her, with only a few pounds in her pocket, to this place from London, intimating that he should join her a month's time.

"Then you are now expecting him?" I said.

"Every day," was the reply; and as I was given, I staggered as though I had been wounded.

Wounded! Ay, I was wounded. The moon, shining feebly through, revealed to me a face not seen for years, but never forgotten—never forgotten—and never will be by me this side of the grave.

Mary Leslie and I had both been born in a village ten miles from here. Suited for each other in every respect, I would have made her my wife, but she refused me. Her parents both died, and, shortly after, she ran away from the guardianship of a very distant relative with the son of a wealthy farmer. The farmer, who was furious, laid all the blame on Mary, and declared her an artful minx, who had inveigled his son. I knew better. She was cruelly deceived, and Mark Sedley was a thorough villain.

And this poor face, so ghastly pale, so worn and wrinkled, was that face!

"Mary!" I gasped.

Then she recognized me in a moment, and with a wild cry threw her arms about my neck, and told me all. The tale was dreadful, worse even than I expected, and I had been full of misgiving. Such neglect, such cruelty, such fiendish ingenuity in maliciousness, as had been exhibited toward the long-enduring and still loving wife, by her deadly-eyed scoundrel of a husband, I, with all my experience of life, could not have conceived. They had been in the depths of poverty; but either through pride, or an impression of its probable inutility, no application had been made to her husband's father for assistance. One day Sedley had, as already stated, ordered her to depart from London for this town, giving no reason for the strange command, save that he was going a journey in which she could not accompany him, but that in a month's time he would be with her at any address which she should send to him at a place he named. Here, then, Mary had arrived, and had found an abode in a cottage of two rooms, close at hand. Some scraps of furniture she had bought for a few shillings, of the previous occupier. The woman she had with her was an old servant of her father's, whom she had met in London, and who would not leave her in her trouble.

"The scoundrel has deserted her," I thought. "Well, better so."

We reached the miserable dwelling, and Mary having entered, I hastened to the work-house, and dispatched a servant to Mrs. Sedley forthwith laden with necessaries of various kinds.

I knew the elder Sedley was still living, as the next morning I rode over to the village in which he resided, and told him my painful discovery. He expressed himself very pleased at the prospective liberty of seeing his son.

"A noble fellow, Mr. Jones," he said, with warmth; "a manly, upright youth as ever lived. Ah! what might he not have been had he not been ruined by that wretched artful girl!"

It was useless to hear him speak thus; but it was not wise to quarrel with him.

"However that may be, Sir," I said, "she is your son's wife, and should you see her comfortless? Something must be done for her."

"Do you expect me to do any thing for her, Mr. Jones?" now, the only reply some ten miles to ask me to help her?"

"Certainly I did. Good Heavens, Mr. Sedley, she was starving—would have starved, had I not met with her! Come and see her."

"Yes, Jones, I will. When she's in her coffin you let me know, and I'll come—with pleasure."

Horrified and disgusted, I shrunk from the implacable old brute, and returned home.

It was evening when I reached the Union Of. fice. My assistant was affixing a placard to the notice-board outside.

"Here's a robbery that has created a bit of a stir since you have been gone," he said, and he handed me a copy of the placard.

It announced a highway robbery committed some fifteen miles off, described certain articles stolen, furnished close particulars of the robber, and offered a reward of £5 for his apprehension.

"Not much chance of the rascal's escaping," remarked Mr. Flash. "Such a most complete portrait: 'Kingsbury prominent front upper teeth; scar on left cheek; very light hair; squints;' and then 'Sedley, Mark.' Why, that's a name, isn't it?"

I put the placard in my pocket, and proceeded to Mary Sedley's cottage. As I journeyed, the marked description of the villain's appearance in the letter dwelt on my mind. The reward was considerable, and should I succeed, what a relief it would be! I ever seen such? Mercy! It flashed across my mind. Yes, there could be no mistake: the account tallied in every point. The scoundrel, as I knew it formerly, of Mark Sedley. I was exceedingly startled, and stopped to think, when my attention was suddenly arrested. Mary shrieked.

I was in the "haunted field." On one side of the way a high bank, with a hedge on the top of it, on the other side of this hedge, were evidently two people talking. I listened; for the circumstance was strange, to hear a man's voice at all.

"You miserable magpie!" was growled in a manner which I knew well, though I had not heard it for years; "I'm a-going to give you over the hedge, you never-ending chatterer."

"Dying," I knew we always been dying," grunted the scoundrel. "What now? Sniveling? What! at seeing me, is it? when the sight ought to make you happier than ever you queen. Now, take care! I only say, TAKE CARE!"

There, I have done. Now, Mark, we're ceased crying: let's be hearty. I'm as very weak. Well, well, never mind. Now just tell me about these things. To whom did you say I was to take them?"

"To a man named Isaac Levy, in Hulk's Alley (just at the end of my lane). I've got a letter you want to sell them, and he'll buy them. He'll ask no questions. To-morrow night, at ten o'clock, I'll come by the hedge-gate, and you can call for me."

"Be But, Mark! now, Mark! I don't want to be curious; I won't ask you again where the articles came from; but do tell me, where are you going to, and how long you'll be away this time; and, dear Mark, how am I to live?"

"How are you to live, eh? Look you, Mary, my love, if you've got me no more money—questions, you sha'n't need to ask me again how you're to live. You're to be and do what you're told: that's enough for you. Now be off, directly, mind, as far as for that old friend of yours, Mr. Jones, I'll square accounts with him in my own time. I'll cut his throat, Mary: you see if I don't."

Then they seemed to separate. I watched about, and saw Mary enter her cottage. I followed her immediately. She screamed loudly.

"Oh, Jones!" she gasped, shaking into a chair; "how you frightened me!"

"Mary Sedley," I said, somewhat sternly, taking up a watch and chain which she had just laid on the table, "where did these come from?"

"Oh, never mind! give them me. They are—"

"Mary, I must, and will, have the fruits of a highway robbery, and the robber was—"

"No, no, no!" she shrieked. "I will not believe it!" she cried, divining my next speech.

"Now be calm, and let me tell you. I heard the prayer part of what passed between you and your husband just now. The man he named to you is a notorious receiver of stolen goods. And that ring!" and I handed her the placard.

She read it.

"My God! this is worse than all," she wailed. "I have starved and suffered well-nigh unto death; yes, almost to death, oh, thank Heaven! but this is terrible."

"Now," I resumed, "there is but one course to be pursued. This ruffian has tortured you long enough. You must be released from him."

"How?"

"How? Why, through the law. He will be transported for life for this offense."

"But he is not in prison yet."

"No; but he will be soon. He is coming here to-morrow night, you know, and I shall have the officers ready for him."

"Ah, true," she said, staring vacantly at me. "I had forgotten. Yes; you would do that, of course."

She seemed bewildered, and, having learned from her that she expected the old servant to return immediately, I thought it best to leave her.

As I passed from the cottage, I pondered her strange look, and lingered at a short distance. The door opened gently. I saw her come forth, look about, close the door, and then run in the direction of the "haunted field" at the top of her speed. The last I distinctly observed to be, "She is seeking Sedley to warn him against coming to-morrow night." I followed. It was perfectly dark, but her white dress enabled me to keep her in view. The field was reached. She wandered about, looking for no one. She crossed again into the road, I still following as quietly as I could. Suddenly she stopped. She had come upon Sedley walking quietly. She touched him on the back, and he sprung round with a cry of alarm and an oath.

"It is I, Mark—I, Mary. I've had such a run, I can hardly speak; I want to tell—"

"You've followed me, I will. When she's in her coffin you let me know, and I'll come—with pleasure."

Horrified and disgusted, I shrunk from the implacable old brute, and returned home.

It was evening when I reached the Union Of. fice. My assistant was affixing a placard to the notice-board outside.

"Here's a robbery that has created a bit of a stir since you have been gone," he said, and he handed me a copy of the placard.

It announced a highway robbery committed some fifteen miles off, described certain articles stolen, furnished close particulars of the robber, and offered a reward of £5 for his apprehension.

"Not much chance of the rascal's escaping," remarked Mr. Flash. "Such a most complete portrait: 'Kingsbury prominent front upper teeth; scar on left cheek; very light hair; squints;' and then 'Sedley, Mark.' Why, that's a name, isn't it?"

I put the placard in my pocket, and proceeded to Mary Sedley's cottage. As I journeyed, the marked description of the villain's appearance in the letter dwelt on my mind. The reward was considerable, and should I succeed, what a relief it would be! I ever seen such? Mercy! It flashed across my mind. Yes, there could be no mistake: the account tallied in every point. The scoundrel, as I knew it formerly, of Mark Sedley. I was exceedingly startled, and stopped to think, when my attention was suddenly arrested. Mary shrieked.

I was in the "haunted field." On one side of the way a high bank, with a hedge on the top of it, on the other side of this hedge, were evidently two people talking. I listened; for the circumstance was strange, to hear a man's voice at all.

"You miserable magpie!" was growled in a manner which I knew well, though I had not heard it for years; "I'm a-going to give you over the hedge, you never-ending chatterer."

"Dying," I knew we always been dying," grunted the scoundrel. "What now? Sniveling? What! at seeing me, is it? when the sight ought to make you happier than ever you queen. Now, take care! I only say, TAKE CARE!"

"There, I have done. Now, Mark, we're ceased crying: let's be hearty. I'm as very weak. Well, well, never mind. Now just tell me about these things. To whom did you say I was to take them?"

"To a man named Isaac Levy, in Hulk's Alley (just at the end of my lane). I've got a letter you want to sell them, and he'll buy them. He'll ask no questions. To-morrow night, at ten o'clock, I'll come by the hedge-gate, and you can call for me."

that would be the envy of some ambitious young carpenter of seven years old, and the pride and glory of his sister's dolls' tea-party; as it may be yet—to harass I know. How its maker's face kindled at the touch of the silver coin and the shake of the hand, which was the only way in which our bargain could be transacted.

"She's bought my table. Lady's bought my table." And then, with a sudden fit of conscientiousness, "Who shall I give the money to?" evidently thinking it right to be remitted among his week's wages, paid by the Association.

I inquired how much he earned.

"Seventeen shillings a week, and could earn much more if we only had it to give him. But even that makes a great difference. When he's at work he's happy, and drinks not unwisely, clearly, he said, because it grieved him to be dependent on his two mothers. Now he is all right, and the merriest fellow possible. I asked him the other day if he were happy. 'Happy!' he said,'to be sure I am. What have I to make me unhappy now? I would be a great shame if I were any thing but happy.'

Poor soul—poor simple, blessed soul! the greatest man on earth might be less enviable than this lad, totally deaf and dumb.

I have thus given a plain account of what I saw and heard that day. Any one with more time, more means, and more practical knowledge than I could hardly expend them better than in becoming "eyes to the blind" by a few visits to 127 Euston Road.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

The votes have been counted in every State in Pennsylvania, Lincoln received 268,030 votes; Fusion, 178,871; Lincoln's vote, 1857, 147,510; Bell, 12,776; Lincoln majority over Fusion, 89,159; over all, 79,872. In Illinois, Lincoln gets 172,502; Douglas, 160,242; Bell, 4,913; Breckinridge, 2,739. The indications are that Bell carries Georgia by about 1,000 votes; Breckinridge, Florida, by about 1900; Bell, Virginia, by about 700. In New York, Lincoln gets 362,646; Fusion, 314,174.—Lincoln's majority, 47,551.

A SPEECH FROM MR. LINCOLN.

A telegram, dated Springfield, Illinois, Tuesday, Nov. 20, says: "The meeting of congratulation, which was at first announced to be held in the evening, has assumed more gigantic proportions. An immense and excited crowd is in attendance, and the illumination is magnificent. Able and brilliant beyond any thing ever seen in the West. All the public buildings, and a large number of private dwellings, are ablaze with fantastic devices. In the dome of the State House are fourteen hundred lights of candles, and the effect for many miles.

"A large torch-light procession has been paraded through the principal streets. Mr. Lincoln and family have halted and called out the President elect with whom they were received with the most hearty enthusiasm at his appearance. The storm of congratulation and cheers which greeted Mr. Lincoln's rise was at last lowered, and Mr. Lincoln said:

"FRIENDS AND FELLOW-CITIZENS,—Please excuse me on this occasion from making a speech. I thank you for the kindness and compliment of this call. It is natural and common with all citizens who have thought fit by their votes to indicate who shall be their rulers. (Applause, and cheering.) Let us at all times remember that all American citizens are brothers of a common mother, and should dwell together in the bonds of fraternal feeling. [Immense applause.] I am unable to say more than return thanks, and to excuse me from further speaking at this time."

THE PRESIDENT-ELECT AT CHICAGO.

A telegram dated Chicago, November 22, says: "Mr. Lincoln, Vice-President-elect, arrived this morning at the car-quarters at the Tremont House, where Mr. Lincoln is stopping. At about o'clock this forenoon a procession of citizens formed in front, in being the first time they have met since the nomination. The procession was headed by the band of the same Congress.—Lincoln in the House and Hamlin in the Senate.—they never met before since their nomination, nor have had an interview with Mr. Lincoln, attended by Mrs. Dodge, of Springfield, Mr. Dunlap, of Ohio, and General Hitchcock, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and Mr. Gage, landlord of the Tremont, who introduced the party to the crowd present during the carriage-call.

"Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Hamlin upon meeting avoided all allusion to politics, and entered into a social conversation, which was soon interrupted by an invitation to visit the hospital, which they were unable to accept. This invitation was accompanied by the announcement that their reception ladies' party is about to be held, and therefore the visit must be made at once, which was done. The President and Vice-President-elect, accompanied by Mrs. Lincoln and Mr. Platt, and attended by several gentlemen, immediately entered carriages and proceeded to Wigwam. After a short tarry the party visited the new Post-office, Custom-house, and United States mint building, and returned to their hotel."

SENATOR DOUGLAS ON SECESSION.

In a speech just delivered at Springfield, Illinois, Senator Douglas said:

"Secession is an impracticable, or rather an impossible thing. The Constitution provides no way by which a State may withdraw from the Union—no way for the dissolution of the Government. The General Government is therefore but little with the individual rights of citizens, except for protection. It is chiefly like a father to the States and its blessings—not in its exactions. If every Federal officer in South Carolina were to resign, their offices would be vacant, and its Legislature declare the State out of the Union, it would all amount to little while the State remained a citizen of that State. So long as the State did not interfere with the exercise of the revenue or the mails, the people in other portions of the Union would not be in the least disturbed. What is the South Carolina people to do when raised? Whom is it to fight? Manifestly, if it commences a war on the United States officers engaged in collecting the revenue, it becomes the aggressor. This would be a singular mode of making war whereby the whole South Carolina makes no complaint against the Revenue laws. It is the power for this—to become the aggressor. He predicted a speedy reaction, and defended Mr. Breckinridge from the charge of disunionism."

MR. LINCOLN NOT TO ENCROACH ON THE SOUTH.

Senator Douglas also said that Mr. Lincoln, although of the candidate of the Republican party, as Lincoln's friend, will not attempt to violate the rights of any other party. When inaugurated he will be the President of the United States, and will be ready to defend and protect the State in which he has not received a single vote against any encroachment upon its constitutional rights, as the one in which he has received the largest support. He says the Republican party are fortunate that they have now in their power to prove that they have never intended, and do not intend, any encroachment upon the rights of any State or any section.

THE ATTITUDE OF GEORGIA.

The Legislature of Georgia has passed the bill granting a million to arm the State. Governor Brown has recommended the Legislature to nominate electors, as no candidate has an absolute majority of the popular vote, as required by the laws of Georgia. The Legislature has authorized a State Convention, the election to take place on 2d January, and the Convention to meet on the Wednesday following.

ATTITUDE OF NORTH CAROLINA.

A telegram dated Raleigh, November 19, says: "Both branches of the Legislature assembled to-day. A strong Southern feeling pervades the entire State.

"The Governor's message, which will be sent in to-morrow, takes strong Southern ground, and recommends a conference with the neighboring States, and then a State Convention, to meet in January. He recommends the enlistment of six men between eighteen and forty-five years, and also recommends the raising of a force of mounted volunteers, with arms and equipments. He goes for resisting any effort at coercion by force of arms."

WHAT THE SOUTH WANTS.

Governor Letcher of Virginia has written a letter in which he says: "The South wants the Constitution and the faithful execution of the laws passed for the recovery and protection of her property. She will never submit to dictation and lend your aid to effect their execution according to the letter and spirit: that if her property is not secured, and its fiend in the non-slaveholding States, you will see that it is protected by the laws of the States. Second: that there is patriotism enough in Pennsylvania and the other non-slaveholding States to repeat that act the law declared to be our due, especially when the preservation of the Union depends upon it. In concluding this brief view of the subject, permit me to add that if the North will repent and uphold the rights of the States, the Union will be perpetual, and country will continue to grow in power and influence, the people of whom will love and revere it. Should the blessings of peace, quiet, and order, and a prosperity such as has never been known over any country in the past history, will be the necessary result."

SENATOR DOUGLAS ON DISUNION.

Senator Douglas has written a letter in which he says: "So men in American regrets the election of Mr. Lincoln than I do. I now make the most emphatic declaration I can defeat him; now differ with him more radically and earnestly than I have done with any other man. But I am not for disunion. Nor am I prepared to resist, in all the legitimate means sanctioned by the Constitution, the will of a majority of the country. Disappointed politicians and ambitious men are unfriended to represent. But while I say this, I am bound, as a public citizen and a member of the party, to state my conscientious conviction that the mere election of any man to the Presidency by the forms prescribed by the Constitution is not sufficient cause for dissolving the Federal Union."

MR. STEPHENS AGAINST SECESSION.

In the course of a speech of great power and talent before the Georgia Legislature, Mr. Stephens said:

"The Constitution that provides for itself is, shall the people of the South secede from the Union in consequence of the election of Mr. Lincoln to the Presidency of the United States? My countrymen, I tell you frankly, candidly, and earnestly that I think you should not. Wait for the consummation, the election of no man, constitutionally chosen to fill any office whatever, is sufficient cause to separate from the Union. It ought to stand by and to aid in maintaining the Constitution and preserving it. It is always a point of resistance to the Government—to withdraw from it because you have not the power to administer it. Meet us in the wrong. We are pledged to maintain the Constitution, and to see that it is executed in its true intent. We, therefore, for the mere election of a man to the Presidency by the forms of the Constitution, will not consent to dissolve the Union, but will make a point of resistance to the Government, without the power to administer it in its honest interpretation. Will you not pause before you do it—would we not be in the wrong? Whatever has been the folly of others, I am sure that the people of the South, the people of the South, and especially to the people of Georgia, that we have been wise in the formation of our elements. Let the fault and the wrong rest upon others. If all our hopes are to be blasted, if the Government is to go down—let us be found to the last moment standing on the last wreck this the ruins of the United States waving over our heads." [Applause.]

UNION MEETING IN GEORGIA.

A telegram dated Augusta, Georgia, November 20, says: "The largest meeting ever held in Greene County, Georgia, came off to-day. Delegates were present from all the county participated. Resolutions of a conservative character were adopted, recommending the calling of a State, and all a State Convention, of all parties, to calmly consider the wrongs demanding the dissolution of the National Union, appealing to the people of the Union to demand the immediate repeal of the obnoxious Personal Liberty Bill, etc., and rally to the support of our imperiled Government. That the political excitement has become intense and excitement, have stirred it up: instead of repressing unlawful combinations, and punishing those engaged in the work of removing causes of dispute, they have created them for the base purpose of using the fears which their own acts have produced to the passions and prejudices of the people at the approaching Presidential election, and that the most extensive and fatal feelings of hate, other unlawful organizations by the leaders of the Republican party, and the formation of secret political societies find themselves engaged in a fierce controversy which can not fail to end in bloodshed.

ENGLISHMEN ENCOURAGING SECESSION.

A gentleman of respectability, just arrived from the South, tells us that the English in that section of country can be counted as many as thirty Englishmen, busily engaged in fanning the flame of secession wherever they have

MORE TROUBLES IN KANSAS.

A telegram dated Washington, November 21, says: "President Buchanan has issued orders for the arrest of the three United States Marshals, dated 21st inst., at Fort Smith, stating that information has been received that the notorious bandit Montgomery, have put themselves in open defiance of the United States Government. The orders have spread great alarm throughout the country. One person has been killed. The object of the present organization to seize the public property, and to march into Missouri, and release Montgomery, who is in custody. The Secretary has dispatched the necessary orders to General Harney, and will proceed with all possible speed in enforcing the laws, and for apprehending guilty persons.

"General Harney has left for the Department under his command, and will make short work of these rebels."

ACTION OF THE LEGISLATURE OF KANSAS.

On Monday, 19th, the Presidents of the leading City Banks met and took into consideration the propriety of exchanging for their joint account in order to get rid of the Kansas State Bank notes, which have flooded the country of late, though the purchases of exchange by the Committee were made. But the Committee found that no satisfactory scheme was adopted. The banks put all their specie into a common bank, and the Committee appointed to buy up the notes of the merchants required—all the banks agreeing to supply specie in proportion to their capital, and in the sequence of the contemplated expansion—all the banks agreeing, which is now declared and will be carried into effect by the Bank of England, afforded decided relief to the public, and the Committee, and many merchants, with checks pass, money became easier, and there was a better market for exchange and for securities.

SUSPENSION OF COUNTRY BANKS.

On 20th November the Farmers' Bank of Virginia, being pressed for coin, suspended specie payments. On the following day the example was followed by the other banks of Richmond, and those of Petersburgh, Virginia, and Baltimore, Maryland. On 23d the banks of Philadelphia, Washington, Wheeling, Norfolk, and Portsmouth followed suit, as also the Farmers' Bank of Charleston, South Carolina. All the Southern banks, with the exception of those of New Orleans, are expected to suspend.

A LARGE FORGERY FOUND OUT.

We have advices of fruit so far southward as the north line of Alabama, which must have killed the cotton-plant, so that the crop of 1861 may be considered made. Its amount is variously estimated at Four, Four and a Quarter, and Four and a Half Millions of bales.

OUTRAGE BY A BRITISH CHIEF JUSTICE.

A telegram dated Washington, November 19, says: "It is understood that information has been received from the Governor of Washington Territory, that a slave on board the American ship, which entered the harbor of Victoria, Vancouver Island, has been taken from the vessel and set free by the British Chief Justice of the Island. A pretty high-handed outrage that."

THE CHRISTIAN NOTABILITIES.

A writer in the Boston Transcript daguerreotypes a few of the notables among the numerous visitors to the Museum of Comparative Zoology at Cambridge on the 13th inst.:

"First we saw Agassiz over the balcony. Our attention was soon arrested and riveted by Mr. ——'s cold, splendid, Webster-like head. Then Longfellow, with his white locks and power: as you gazed, fascinated by its beautiful calm, you forgot the pallor of hidden deep pain in the soul, there was not passion and tenderness. I do not wonder at, to write such a poem as 'Excelsior,' a man was driven to it by.

"A stir and a buzz; some one has entered with looking at. Ah, I see; it is that man in the reserved pews. What a face! What power and powerful, fiery yet thoughtful. Is he a minister? He does not wear the look of it. Ah, no! he is not a man to be a minister. He don't look pious enough. A politician? No, not that: the eager, watchful, restless look that distinguishes statesmen is wanting; he has too much self-repose for a politician. A lawyer, then? Perhaps. There is much of both spirituality and action about him. Who and what can he be? I catch a name whispered about—Theodore Ward Beecher. No wonder I could not class him; he is the representative of a class which has arisen in modern years. It was one night in the old Tremont Temple, when he stood up to speak. He was quite young then. As he stands now he wields a greater moral power than any person in our country, probably. He is a world-wide man.

"Others are coming in. There is old President Hitchcock, looking as if he had in his care he bore, with flexible bright and clear! The dents are there, but the lines of thought and care are not there on the air, flushing all sounds save of beating hearts. Here comes Agassiz, a Swiss-looking man, with long hair, and his thousand hearty years to offer him the homage of deepest admiration and love. Longfellow, Dr. Holmes, and a host in past, and we can look at others, see what a noble band of men did the University of Cambridge give the Governor at the next of honor; how cool and strong he looks, watchful, but still as a man who has no fear of any thing, and a full, not, perhaps, because you how to the night and neighborly of classical free of Sparks and the large plan of Harvard, President Walker (late President of Harvard). He looks as if one of the old Puritan divines had stepped out of the past."

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.

The Herald correspondent writes: "The beau monde of Washington is in a state of excitement, and society is diverted from discussion and secession by the celebration of the union of the two most conspicuous young beaux in society for many a day. The bride is the second daughter of the Hon. Jacob Thompson, Secretary of the Interior, in Mr. Buchanan's cabinet, and on this occasion shone with all the majesty of her office. The bridegroom, Charles E. Lippitt, son of Hon. Dudley T. Lippitt, of New Jersey, a youth of fortune, and one of the high private circles. The Secretary Thompson, Mrs. Gwin, and other leaders of the fashionable world, the President was present to give away the bride. Nothing but the promise and intention to attend, by the presence of the President, could keep the multitude of persons from the bridegroom, and the banquet all that refined taste could add to the entertainment. The popularity of the Union was drunk in many a bumper with a will."

MR. BUCHANAN'S HOME.

The London Times says: "We notice that a Washington correspondent now and then assures himself by ascertaining in person that the home of President Buchanan—some positively asserting that after the 4th of March next he will make a permanent residence in Washington letter-writer any further trouble on this point, we feel ourselves bound to say that Wheatland, and the Mecca of the political pilgrims in 1856, is to remain the home of the ex-President. Some writers assign a couple of the subordinates of the White House cause to them, and, indeed, Mr. Buchanan, on his inauguration, proceeded to put the premises in proper order for reception.

Now Wheatland will be a more than ever a favorite residence than ever; and, indeed, no more beautiful retreats for a statesman could be found in the Old Dominion than Wheatland. There Mr. Buchanan will have a quiet, invigorating, picturesque rural retreat, to pursue the literary labors in which he delights, and where he can devote the remainder of his days after vacating the White House.

A TRYING ORDEAL.

The Times says: "Lord Palmerston's next settled troubles are, within the past ten months, passed through a fiery and trying ordeal, the results of which he may found off the stage. The eldest daughter, a sweet girl of nineteen, married Lord Ossington, a young nobleman, whose blushes most creditably, not at Newport with a middle-aged gentleman of great eminence, modest demeanor, and with apparently well-filled pockets. After a few weeks' acquaintance the young nobleman, who, as we have supposed, the young lady was entranced; but one point of discussion occurred which must their great mind of the perfect happiness—he professed a most decided preference for Miss Ada Cowper. The young lady was not to be won by a strictest sort. They were married—they traveled. Hardly had Lady Ossington's honeymoon shone when the world developed a most singular and unpromised degree of nervousness, and the world of Lord Ossington. He had borne in silent submission, but at last it became intolerable. He was compelled to leave her abroad, the wife and passage in the Africa, and arrived at her father's home in Piccadilly unexpectedly on a Saturday morning. The secretary, as gathered from her eye lips, is most heart-broken. She tells of private scenes of hostility and degradation that make the blood of the hearer boil with indignation. Such is the story of the wife of the Parliamentary leader, and the victim who has, within one year, been a maiden and a bride, a mother, a wife, a mother, with reason, and a wife at home with those best friends of life—a loving father and a loving mother."

PERSONAL.

A complimentary benefit was given to Governor Banks last night, on Tuesday, by the citizens of Waltham, irrespective of party, at which the Governor was presented with a service of silver plate, and Mrs. Banks a valuable gold watch. The contemplated departure of Governor Banks for the West causes much regret among his neighbors.

A young lady residing in Newburyport, on the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, having been disappointed in a love affair, left the house a few nights since, went to the railroad track, and having thrown her clothes over her head, deliberately laid down across the rail of the rails, and remained there until a train ran over her, killing her instantly.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE SECRET DESPATCHES.

The most important feature in the news from England is the speeches of Lord Palmerston and the Count de Persigny, delivered on the 9th inst. at the Lord Mayor of London's grand civic entertainment. The French Embassador was present at the celebration, and the cordial relations between England and France, and maintained that the European peace had faithfully observed the programme of peace he had laid down during his visit to London.

Lord Palmerston, in returning thanks on behalf of her Majesty's Ministers, spoke of the general prospects of peace as being "at all events satisfactory." He complimented the Emperor of the French for the "sagacity" he had displayed in co-operating with her Majesty's Government in the great work of extending commercial intercourse between the two countries, and expressed a hope that while the commercial treaty would tend to consult still more closely the interests of England and France, it would have the effect of inducing other crowned heads to look favorably on an enterprise which contained "the secret elements of peace."

THE FRENCH ON THEIR WAY HOME.

Prince Alfred arrived at Plymouth on the morning of the 15th. The Emperor's fleet had already arrived, but two vessels, supposed to be the Hero and Arcadia, were seen off Portland on the night of the 15th.

ITALY.

RETIREMENT OF GARIBALDI.

A telegram, dated Naples, November 8, says: "On the 7th prior to his leaving Naples, Garibaldi visited the Court in the carriage.

"At about 11 A.M., Garibaldi, accompanied by the Ministers, formally presented to the King the result of the plebiscite, which was read by Signor Mancini, Minister of Justice. The Minister, signor Conforti, addressed the King thus:

"SIRE,—The Neapolitans, by a large majority, in their Electoral Committee, having proclaimed you King by acclamation, and by nine millions of votes, have declared themselves to the other provinces, which your Majesty governs as King of Italy, constitutional, by the solemn promise that Italy should belong to the Italians."

The King replied in a few expressive words.

"The deed of annexation was then drawn up; the Dictatorship ceased, and the Italian flag hoisted.

"Garibaldi has retired to his island home."

PROGRESS OF THE WAR.

A telegram dated Naples, dated November 3, says that the French Squadron had left the mouth of the Garigliano and returned to Gaeta before the 1st inst. The French fire that after taking part in the operations against Gaeta the Piedmontese squadron would proceed to Naples, and at a short distance from the fortress, where it remained at anchor. The Independance Belge, from La Patrie, has news that the fall of Naples, looks upon the game as up and says the remaining fortresses will follow the fate of Capua and Gaeta. The latest correspondent at Rome says the French envy at the Piedmontese for having in the space of a few days succeeded in a task the force of military inspection General Goyon and the French army had been unable to accomplish in a month. The Pope is still occupying the Quirinal.

About 15,000 Neapolitans, 10,000 Swiss and 25 guns, have embarked at Gaeta for Bordighera, and 5,000 for the United States at Terracina. At Caserta their progress was arrested by the rain, which commenced to fall in torrents and lasted at once discussed. The Daily News says a work ago the strength of the army of the two Sicilies was estimated at from 40,000 to 50,000 men, the latter being regarded as an extreme limit. Of this force 15,000 were engaged in the lines by the fall of Capua, and the battle of the 31, at less than 10,000 men. Now, in less than a week, there will be not 30,000 men. The Post says, after the fall of Gaeta, Garibaldi's resolution is taken. He will retire to private life.

THE VOTE AT NAPLES.

The Times has received the following telegram from its Naples correspondent:

"Naples, Thursday evening, Sunday, Sunday, &c.

The plebiscite has been declared lovely. 7,50,000

MEETING OF GARIBALDI AND VICTOR EMMANUEL.

The Naples correspondent writes: "I have agreed that his Majesty should meet Garibaldi at the foot of a hill about two miles from Naples, and that the latter should ride the Elder and Bible divisions, which had followed us. At the foot of the hill I drew up my cavalry, and infantry, who were drawn up in good order, and, although covered with dust, they looked splendid. Victor Emmanuel, with his suite, who had made his appearance, followed by a brilliant staff, Garibaldi and his staff came on. The meeting was cordial. The elegant and splendid uniforms of the Piedmontese officers contrasted strongly with the red shirts and dress of the Garibaldians. The General himself wore his famous wide hat, and his red shirt, and looked as if he had been in the field. He was mounted on a pair of handsome grays. It is true that he had at his side his famous English groom, who had followed him throughout his campaign, and who was a most bridled uniforms in the world. The two great leaders met in the most cordial manner possible. The King and Garibaldi rode side by side, and the latter was heard to say he could see by their faces that their shake of the hands was the commencement of a new era of prosperity for the Italian people, and of the greatest admiration on the King's. The King and Garibaldi left with a certain distance, and indulged in breathless expectation for the conversation of these two great men. The King was heard to say to Garibaldi, in reply, that without his having exploded the unity of Italy would have been a reality for years to come. "I will say he, Sire," answered Garibaldi, "but I could not have done without the King and his army." Victor Emmanuel has the most noble and generous of Kings."

CONFISCATION OF THE EX-KING'S PROPERTY.

The Turin Official Gazette publishes the following important decree:

"Whereas it appears that on that deplorable day, the 15th of May, 1848, the Government of the Bourbons violated every principle of right and humanity, and not only shed human blood, and for the authority of the law substituted the arbitrary power of despotism, but by the measures which emerged from that civil catastrophe raged with fury against the property of citizens, and not only took away from them their goods, but even those of families, so that honorable men and lovers of their country were deprived of their patrimony, and were obliged to proceed with victims and a large number of citizens compelled to leave their country, and that the Parliament Bolino said benign lands; considering that the losses and evils produced by the Bourbon tyranny were so overwhelming that it is a debt of justice worthy of an Italian and free Government to compensate, as far as possible, the losses suffered for the cause which now triumphs—it is decreed that all the goods confiscated from the Bourbons and placed at the disposal of the State the sum of six millions of francs annually, to be distributed with due consideration to the political victims of the 15th of May, 1848, of those continental provinces, etc. G. GARIBALDI."

GERMANY.

THE MEETING AT WARSAW.

A telegram dated Vienna, November 6, 1860, says: "Count Rechberg has addressed a circular note on the Warsaw interview to the representatives of Austria abroad. In it he says that the object of the interview was to establish a good understanding between the Courts of the three princes present, and to concert the principles for the guidance of their conduct in view of certain eventualities.

"Count Rechberg, without entering upon any discussion to the nature of the arrangements concluded, announces that a complete understanding was established. He, however, makes it clearly understood that non-intervention in the affairs of the Papal States was agreed upon, although anxious to support the principles of order and European equilibrium. The Count declares that there is nothing which might provoke a war.

"M. Bourqueney, the new Embassador, has left for Southampton, on his way to Madeira, to prepare quarters for her Majesty."

MEXICO.

RESIGNATION OF MIRAMON.

Mexican news of a later date reaches us by way of Havana and New Orleans. Miramon, it is stated, had resigned, and had been succeeded by Robles. The cause of his resignation is not stated, but we had been led to expect it by the statement that he had been unsuccessful in all the movement is to be looked for in the utter hopelessness of the cause in which he was engaged. The Bourbonites had evacuated Puebla.

THANKSGIVING DAY, 1860.—THE

TWO GREAT CLASSES OF SOCIETY.

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER,

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXII.

We continued our journey the next morning, but it was not without considerable difficulty that I succeeded in maintaining my former place in the cabriolet. That stupid old woman fancied that prince was born to be bored, and suggested, accordingly, that I should travel inside with her, leaving the maccaw and the toy terriers to keep company with Miss Herbert. It was only by insisting on an outside place as a measure of health that I at last prevailed, telling her that Dr. Constantine was peremptory on two points regarding me. "Let him," said he, "have abundance of fresh air, and never be without some young companion."

And so we were again in our little leathern tent, high up in the fresh breezy atmosphere above dusty roads, and with a glorious view over that lovely country that forms the approach to the Black Forest. The road was hilly, and the carriage-way a heavy one; we had six horses, who trotted along lustily, shaking their merry bells, and flourishing their scarlet tassels, while the postilions cracked their whips or broke out into occasional inspiriting performances, palpably intended to announce to the passing peasants that we were very great folk, and well able to pay for all little more than required.

I was not ashamed to confess my enjoyment in thus whirling along at some ten miles an hour, remembering how that great sage Dr. Johnson had confessed to a like pleasure, and animated by the inspiriting air and the lovely landscape, could not help asking Miss Herbert if she did not feel it "very jolly."

She looked with a sort of constrained courtesy that by no means responded to the warmth of my own enthusiasm, and I felt vexed and chafed accordingly.

"Perhaps you prefer traveling inside?" said I, with some pique.

"No, Sir."

"Perhaps you dislike traveling altogether?"

"No, Sir."

"Perhaps—" But I checked myself—and with a somewhat stiff air, I said, "Would you like a book?"

"If it would not be rude to read, Sir, while you—"

"Oh, not at all, never mind me, I have more than enough to think of. Here are some things by Thomas Moore and Lord Byron, and some guide-book trash." And with that I handed her several volumes, and sank back into my corner in sulky isolation.

How was a change! Ten minutes ago all nature smiled; from the lark in its flight high heavens to the chirping grasshopper in the tall maize-field, it was one song of joy and gladness. The very clouds as they swept past their new and varied light over the scene, as though to show fresh effects of beauty on the landscape —the sunlight and sky in circling eddies, like smiles upon a lovely face—and now all was sad and rain-drenched! "What has wrought this dreary change?" thought I; "is it possible that the cold looks of a young woman, good-looking, I grant, but no regular downright beauty after all, can have altered the aspect of the whole world to you? Are you so poor a creature in yourself, Potts, so begared in your own resources, so barren in all the appliances of thought and reflection, that if your companion, whoever she or he may be, say nothing, you must needs reflect the humor? Are you nothing but the mirror that dashes a bright picture before it?"

I set myself deliberately to scan the profile beside me; her black veil, drawn down on the side furthest from me, formed a sort of background, which displayed her pale features more distinctly and also the bonnet and cloak was beautifully regular, but the mouth was, I resolved, severe; there was a slight retraction of the upper lip that seemed to indicate peevishness, and then the chin was deeply indented—"a sign," Lavater says, "of those who have a will of their own." "Potts," thought I, "she'd rule you—that's a nature would speedily master yours. I don't think there's any softness either, any of that yielding gentleness that makes home the poetry of womanhood; besides, I suspect she's worldly—very, smurply-not worldly, but very worldly! She is, in fact"—and here I unconsciously uttered my thoughts aloud—"she is, in fact, not a Vera, how much more you got a year? Let us have if in figures."

"So you are still ruminating over the life of that interesting creature," said she, laying down her book to laugh; "and, shall I confess, I lay awake half the night inventing incidents and imagining situations for him."

"For whom?" said I, innocently.

"For Potts, of course. I can not get him out of my head such as I first caught he might be, and I see now, by your unconscious allusion to him, that he has his place in your contemplation also."

"You mistake, Miss Herbert—at least you very much misapprehend my conception of that character. The Potts family has a high historic tradition. Sir Constantine Potts was cup-bearer to Henry the Second, and I really see no reason why ridicule should attach to one who may be, most probably, his descendant."

"I'm very sorry, Sir, if I should have dared to differ with you; but when I heard the name first, and in connection with two such names as Algernon Sydney, and when I thought by what strange accident did they associate the name of one person—"

"You are very young, Miss Herbert, and therefore not removed from this school that is teachable," said I, with a grand didactic look. "Let me guard you, therefore, against the letting of classical inferences. When we would say if a person named Potts were to make the offer of his hand? I mean, if he were a man in all respects acceptable, a gentleman captivating in manner and address, agreeable in person, graceful and accomplished—what would you reply to his advances?"

"Indeed, Sir, I am shocked to think of the humble opinion I may be conveying of my sense and judgment, but I'm afraid I should tell him it is impossible I could ever permit myself to be called Mrs. Potts."

"But, in Heaven's name, why?—I ask you why?"

"Oh, Sir! don't be angry with me; it surely does not deserve such a penalty; at the worst it is a mere caprice or—or—"

"I am not angry, young lady. I am simply provoked; I am provoked to think that a propos dice so unworthy of you should exercise such a control over your judgment."

"I am quite ashamed, Sir, to have been the occasion of so much displeasure to you. I hope and trust you will ascribe it to my utter ignorance of the art of the world."

"If you are dissatisfied with yourself, Miss Herbert, I have no alternative but to shut up a book and pretending to read, while I felt such a disgust to myself that if I hadn't been strapped up with a leather strap to the seat, I think I should have thrown myself headlong down and hit the wheel pass over me. "What is it, Potts, that a man who has studied mankind naturally fine and noble nature you are certainly endowed with—that you should submit meekly to princely rank? If you were not a royal highness would you have dared to utter such cruelties as these? Would you, in the very extremity of moods, have presumed to make that pale cheek paler, and forced a tear-drop into that liquid eye? I am afraid to think that the very greatest effort of a man was to keep himself on a level with those born above him, and that it is far harder to stoop than to stand on tiptoe. Such a pain in the back comes of always bending, and it is so difficult to do it gracefully!"

I was positively dying to be what the French call "ton prince," and yet I didn't know how to set about it. I could not take off one of my decorations—a cross or a ribbon—for I had none; nor give it, because no living woman, I couldn't wear it. I couldn't make her one of the court ladies, for I was not a prince; and yet it was clear something should be done, if one only knew what it was. "I suppose now," said I to myself, "a real R.H. would know in a way here at once; the right thing to do, the exact expression to use, would occur as naturally to his mind as the first combination presents itself to mine. 'Whenever your head aches not gladly, I pray you, command me to your heart;' and so I did, and my heart spoke thus: 'Tell her, Potts, who you are, and what; say to her, "Listen to me, child, in the name of truth from one who could tell you far more glibly, far more freely, and far more willingly, a whole budget of lies; in the light of his own heart that he deceive the old lady inside, but now be one and all sincere." Do not deny the sacrifice a light one; it cost St. George far less to go out dragon-hunting than it costs me to slay this monster whom ever prompts me to feats of fancy.'"

"I am very sorry to be troublesome, Sir, but as we change horses here I'll ask you to have the kindness to alight; the weather looks very threatening, and some drops of rain have already fallen."

These words roused me from my reverie to action, and I got down to the road-side where, either, for I slipped, and made the postilion laugh, and then I helped her, who accomplished the descent so neatly, as to show a fairish and a least portion of such an ankle, and accidentally giving me such a squeeze of the hand! The next moment she was lost to me, the clanking steps were drawn up, the harsh door banged to, and I was left—all alone—in the dark.

Like a sulky eagle, sick of the world, I climbed up to my eyrie. I no longer wished for sunshine or company; I felt that I was one of the postboys put on their overcoats and prepare for a regular downpour. I began to think there are some women of than even Potts. In half an hour they will be drenched to the skin, and I'll just feel a shade worse.

The little glass slide at my back was now withdrawn, and Miss Herbert's pale, sweet face appeared at it. She was saying that Mrs. Keates urgently entreated I would come inside, that she was so uneasy at my being exposed to such a storm.

I refused, and was about to enter into an account of my own feelings, when again the slide was closed and my listener lost to me.

"Is it possible, Potts," said I, "that she has detected this turn of yours for the imaginative line, and that she will not encourage it, even tacitly? Has she said, 'There is a young man of genius, with undoubted and high, but latent qualities, and yet such is the exuberance of his fancy that he is perpetually misled. He is content to let him walk the earth like other men, else attaches wings to him, and carries him off into the upper air. I will endeavor, however hard the task, to clip his feathers and bring him back to the common haunts of men?' Try it, fair enchantress—try it!"

The rain was now coming down in torrents, and with such swooping gusts of wind that I was forced to fasten the leather curtain in front of me, and sit in utter darkness, denied even the passing pleasure of seeing the drenched postboys bobbing up and down on the wet saddles. I grew moody and sad. Every Blue Devil of my acquaintance came to pay his visit to me, and brought a few more of his private friends. I bethought me that I was barely traveling every farther and farther from my home; that all this long road must surely be retraced one day or other, though not in a carriage and post, but probably in a one-horse cart, with a mounted gendarme on either side of it, and a string to my two wrists in their bridle bands. I thought of that vulgar herd of mankind so ready to weep over a romance, and yet send the man who acts one to a penal settlement. I thought how I should be described as the artful knave, the accomplished swindler. As if I was the first man who ever took an exaggerated estimate of his own merits! Go into the House of Commons, visit the National Gallery, dine at a tur or a military mess, frequent, in one word, any of the haunts of men, and with what "pieces pour rire" a thinking observer of deception will you come back loaded!

The dashing window at my back now was drawn aside, and I heard Miss Herbert's voice:

"If I am not giving you too much trouble, Sir, would you kindly see if I have not dropped a bracelet, a small jet bracelet, in the coupé?"

"I am in the dark here, but I'll do my best to find it."

"We are very nearly so too," said she; "and Mrs. Keates is fast asleep, quite unmindful of the thunder."

With some struggling I managed to get down on my knees, and with soon engaged in very vigorous search. To aid me, I lighted a lucifer match, and by its flickering glare, I saw my right front tooth in a shameful pale face, inclosed as it were in a frame by the little window. Who blushed to find herself in any guise, for I utterly forgot myself in my occupation, and stared at though at a picture. My match went out, and I felt ashamed; there she was still, and I could not force myself to turn away, but gazed on in rapture.

"I am sorry to give you this trouble, Sir," said she, in some confusion; "pray never mind it. It will doubtless be found this evening when we arrive."

Another lucifer, and now I pretended to be in most great distress, but somehow my eyes would look up and rest upon her sweet countenance.

"A diamond bracelet, you said?" muttered I, not knowing what I was saying.

"No, Sir, mere jet, and of no value whatever, save to myself. I am really distressed at all the inconvenience I have occasioned you. I entreat you to think no more of it."

My match was out, and I had not another. "Was ever a man robbed of such ecstasy for a mere peevish speech and a little subject? Oh, Fortune! is not this downright cruelty?"

As I mumbled my complaints, I searched away with as much zeal as if the bracelet were all over, and poking away into most inscrutable recesses and crannies, when, in a most unexpecting tone, apologized for her request, and besought me to forget.

"Found!" cried I, in true delight, as I chanced upon the treasure at my feet.

"Oh, Sir, you have made me so happy, and am so much obliged, so grateful to you!"

"Not another word, I beseech you," whispered I, "or I shall be overcome by turning my head with ecstasy. Give me your hand, let me clasp it on your arm, and I am repaid."

"Will you restore it to me, Sir, through the window," said she, timidly.

"Ah," cried I, in anguish, "your gratitude has been very short-lived."

She muttered something I could not catch, but I knew she was busy with the catch of the window-frame, and dark as it was, pitch dark, I knew her hand was close to me. Opening the bracelet, I passed it over her wrist as reverently as though it were the arm of a Queen of Spain, one touch of whom is high treason. I trembled so that I could scarce screw the catch, could make the clasp meet. This done, I felt she was withdrawing her hand, when with something like the knowledge impulse by which men set their lives on one chance, I seized the fingers in my grasp, and implanted two rapturous kisses on them. She snatched her hand hastily away, closed the window with a sharp bang, and I was alone again in my darkness, but I had such a flutter of blissful delight that even the last reproving word was a source of pain to me. It mattered little to me that day that the lightning filled a great pine and threw it across the road, that the thunder broke as swollen that we only could pass them with crowds of peasants around the carriage with ropes and poles to secure it, that the rain poured in harnessed in front of our leaders to enable us to meet the hurricane, or that the postboys were paid treble their usual fare for the perils to life and limb they braved.

I cared for none of these. In the words of the poet,

"Ich habe genossen das trübeste Glück,
Ich habe geliebt und geliebt"

CHAPTER XXIII.

We arrived at a small inn on the borders of the Altisch at nightfall; and though the rain still poured down in torrents, and the river rose in masses of cloud hung half-way down the mountains, I could see that the spot was highly picturesque and romantic. Before I could descend from my lofty eminence, so strapped and buttoned and buckled up was I, the ladies had time to get out and reach their rooms. When I asked to be shown to mine, the landlord, in a very free-and-easy tone, told me that there was nothing for me but a double-bedded room, which I must share with another traveler. I accepted this proposition at once with a degree of force and, indeed, of violence, that I fancied must prove irresistible: but the stupid German, armed with his unconscious phlegm, simply said, "Take it or leave it, it's nothing to me," and left me to look after his business. I stormed and fumed. I asked the chambermaid if she knew who I was, and sent for the Hauskneckt to tell him that all Europe should ring with his indignity. I more than hinted that the landlord had sealed his own doom, and that his miserable cabaret had seen its last days of prosperity.

I asked next, where was the Jew peddler. I felt certain he was a fellow with pencil-cases and pipe-heads, who could sell me the other half the territory. Could he not be bought up? He would surely sleep in the cow-house, if it were too wet to go up a tree!

François came to inform me that he was out fishing; that he had killed all sorts, and some home after dark; his man had told him so much.

"His man? Why, has he a servant?" asked I. "He's not quite such a beggar, then, as I fancy. I'll sort of peasant, with a green jacket and a tall hat and tenderer gaiters, like a Tyrolese."

"Strolling actors, I'll be sworn," muttered I; "fellows taking a week's holiday on their way to a new engagement. How long have they been here?"

"Came on Monday last in the diligence, and are to remain a week, he tweenish; two florins a day they give for every thing."

"What nation are they?"

"Germans, Sir, regular Germans; never a pipe out of their mouths, master and man. I warmed with them to him this morning, for they have put up a bed for me in his room."

A sudden thought now struck me: "Why should not François give up his bed to the stranger, and occupy the one in my room?" This arrangement would be better, and it might to be all the same to Hans or Goetz, or whatever he was. "Just longe about the door, François," said I, "till he comes back, and when you see him, open the thing to him, civilly, of course; and if a crown piece, or even two, will be any consideration, I'll pay you. Do you hear? You understand?"

François would like a man who had corrupted custom-house officers in his time, and even bribed bigger functionaries at a pinch.

"Now, my dear fellow, you know, François, just hint that if he sends in his pack in the course of the evening, the ladies might possibly take a fancy to another."

Another wink.

"And observe out—vaguely, of course, very vaguely—that we are swells, but in strict incog."

A great scoundrel was François; he was Swiss, and could cheat any one, and, like a regular rogue, never happier than when you gave him a mission of deceit and duplicity. "I understand; I gave him his instructions, I regarded the negotiation as though it were completed, and now remembered that I had a fit of hunger on me at supper, which, with national obstinacy, the landlord declared could not be served before nine o'clock. As usual, Mrs. Keates had gone to bed immediately on arriving; but when sending me a "Gloucester" by her maid, she said, "that whenever supper was served, Miss Herbert would come down."

I had no sitting-room save the common room of the inn, a long, low-ceilinged, dreary chamber, with a large green stove in one corner, and down the centre a great oak table, which might have served about forty guests. At one end of this three covers were laid for me, the napkins inclosed in bone circlets, and the salt in great leaden receptacles—like big ink bottles —and a dim, dreary brass lamp, giving its dim radiance over all. It was wearisome to sit down alone before such crooked wooden chairs, and not less irksome to walk on the gritty, sanded floor, and so I lounged in one of the windows, and looked out on the scene. As I looked I saw the figure of a man with a fishing-basket and rod on his shoulder approaching the house. I guessed at once it was the stranger, and opening the window a few inches, I listened to hear the dialogue between him and François. The latter was inclosed in the same pouch as the door, so that I could hear a good deal of what passed. François accosted him politely, addressed him as his son's master, and the size of the fish he had taken. I could not hear the reply, but I remarked that the stranger opened his basket, and that displaching the contents in different directions, seem were for some end, and seemed to the yeoman, some for the brigadier of the gendarmery, and one large trout for the miller's daughter. The cooking words, "Fry," were spoken, said François, as he heard the message. Again the stranger said something, and I thought, from the action of his hand, and François repeated it, and then I saw them walk apart for a few seconds, during which François seemed to have all the talk to himself, a good omen, as it appeared to me, of success, and a sure warranty that the treaty was signed. François, however, did not come to report progress, and so I closed the window and sat down.

"So you've got company to-night, Master Ludwig," said the stranger, as he entered, followed by the host, who specially retained to whisper that one of the arrivals was then before him. The stranger bowed stiffly, but courteously to me, and I returned not less haughtily; and I now saw that he was a man about thirty-five, but much freckled, with a light-brown beard and mustache. On the whole, a good-looking fellow, with a very upright carriage, and something of a cavalry soldier in the swing of his gait.

"Would you like it at once, Herr Graf?" said the host, obsequiously.

"No, he's a count, is he?" said I, with a sneer to myself. "These counthips go a short way with me."

"You had better consult your other guests; I am ready when they are," said the stranger.

Now, though the speech was polite and even considerate, I lost sight of the courtesy in thinking that it implied we were about to say nothing more, and that the third cover was meant for him.

"I say, landlord," said I, "you don't intend to tell me that you have no private sitting-room, but that ladies of condition must needs come down and sup here with—" I was going to say Heaven knows who, but I halted, and said, "with the general company."

"Then, my nothing!" was the sturdy response. "The guests in this house eat here, or don't eat at all: eh, Herr Graf?"

"Well, so far as my experience goes, I can corroborate you," said the stranger, laughing; "though, you may remember, I have often counseled you to make some change."

"That you have; but I don't want to be better than my father or my grandfather; and the Archduke Charles stopped here in their time, and never complained with his treasure!"

I told the landlord to apprise the young lady whenever supper was ready, and I walked to a distant part of the room and sat down.

In about ten minutes after Miss Herbert appeared, and the supper was served at once. I had not met her since the incident of the bracelet; and I was shocked to see how cold she was in her manner, and how resolute in repelling the most harmless familiarity toward her.

I wanted to explain to her that it was through no fault of mine we were to have the company of that odious stranger; that it was one of the disagreeables of these way-side hostels, and to be borne with patience; and that though he was a stage-player, or a sergeant of dragoons, he was respectable indeed and quiet. It was contrive to mumble out some of this explanation; but instead of attending to it, I saw her eyes following the stranger, who had just dropped a large riding-cloak over a clothes-horse behind her chair, to serve as a screen. Thanks are all very well, but by no means certain that gratitude requires such a sweet glance as that, not to mention that I saw the expression in her eyes for the first time.

I thought the soup would choke me. I almost hoped it would, as Othello was a little fit of jealousy compared to me, and I felt that strangling would not half gut my vengeance. And how they talked!—his compliments were on her accent, and she telling him how her first governess was a Hanoverian from Celle, where they are all such purists. There was nothing they did not discuss in those detestable gutturals, and as quickly as if it had been a pleasant meet for human lips. I could not eat a mouthful, but I drank and watched them. The fellow was not long conveying himself to the soup deep in the drains. He knew every play of Schiller by heart, quoted the Wallenstein, the Robbers, Don Carlos, and Mont Stuart at will; so, too, was he familiar with Goethe and Lessing. He had all the swinging compliments of the boards, and declaimed so very profession-ally that, as he concluded a passage, I cried out, without knowing it,

"Take that for your benefit; it's the best you have given yet."

O Lord, how they laughed! She covered up her face and smothered it; but he lay back, and holding his sides with both hands, he positively shouted and screamed aloud. I would have given ten years of life for the courage to have thrown my glass of wine in his face; but it was no use; Nature had been a niggard to me in that quarter, and I had to sit and hear it —exactly as long as I could hear it—while they made twenty attempts to recover their gravity and behave like ladies and gentlemen, and when, the sooner would they look toward me, than off they were again as bad as before.

I resolved a dozen cutting sarcasms, all beginning with, "Whenever I feel assured that you have sufficiently regained the customary calm of good society," but the dessert was served ere I could complete the sentence; and now they were deep in the Three Poets—Cappiug, Bürger, and Korner, and Freiligrath, and the rest of them. As I listened to their enthusiasm, I wondered why people never went into raptures over a cold in the head. But it was not to end here. There was an old harpsichord in the room, and this he opened and set to work on that fearful two-handed fashion your German slons exhibit—viz., The poor old wretch'd instrument shook on its three legs, while the fourth fell clean off, and the loose wires jangled and jarred like knives in a tray; but he only sang the louder, and her ecstasies grew all the greater too.

Heaven reward you, dear old Mrs. Keates, when you sent word down that you couldn't sleep a wink, and begging them to shut up the merry band something and let them go away; and then Miss Herbert wished him a sweet good-night, as he accompanied her to the door, and then there was more good-night, and I believe I had a short fit; but when I came to myself he was sitting smoking his cigar opposite me.

"You are no relative, no connection of the young lady who has just left the room?" said he to me, with a grave manner, so significant of something under it, that I replied, hastily, "None—none whatever."

"We all retreat when she spoke to me in the porch, as I came in this evening, yours?"

"Yes." This I said more boldly, as I suspected he was coming to the question Francois had opened.

"He mentioned to me," said he, slowly, and puffing his cigar at easy intervals, "that you desire your servant should sleep in the same room with you. I am always happy to meet the wishes of courteous fellow-travelers, and so I have ordered my servant to give you his bed; he will sleep up stairs in what was intended for you. Good-night!" And with an insolent nod he lounged out of the room, and left me.

STUDENT AFFRAY AT HARVARD COLLEGE.

We publish on the following page a picture of the affray which took place on 19th at Harvard College, Cambridge, Massachusetts, and which has since ended in the suspension for one and two years of eight members of the Sophomore class.

We have had occasion more than once to allude to the rivalry which exists between the Sophomores and the Freshmen at Harvard. Every year the two classes have been in the habit of playing a great base-ball match; we gave a picture of the scene in No. 170 of Harper's Weekly. Generally the game has degenerated into something very like a fight, and has not tended to improve the feelings of mutual respect entertained by each class. It is a "Sophs," moreover, it is alleged, have been in the habit of annoying—or "hazing" as it is called—the Freshmen to an intolerable degree. Some months since the authorities resolved to put an end to the practice. President Felton, accordingly, by order of the Faculty, forbade the usual base-ball match, and sent a circular to the parents of members of the Sophomore class warning them that they would be punished if they continued to "haze" the Freshmen. This circular and the action of the Faculty were communicated to the Sophomores, and as that they were forewarned of what might happen in case of further trouble.

The vote of the Faculty of Harvard on these subjects read as follows:

"Voted, that the present Freshman Class be informed, before the end of the term, that the practice of hazing, between the Sophomore and Freshman Classes, that has been customary at the beginning of the College year, is hereby prohibited for the future.

"Voted, that the President be requested to take measures for the suppression of the practice of annoying the Freshmen, which is represented to have grown into an intolerable nuisance, and to inform the Sophomore class any person detected in such practice will be summarily dismissed from College."

Notwithstanding this warning, on 19th a band of Sophomores met two Freshmen, and began to "haze" them. They had with them a tar barrel, and loaded with powder, and fired it in the face of one of the Sophs. The latter then withdrew to their rooms, making a great noise, apparently to annihilate the Freshmen. Next day the Faculty met, heard evidence on the subject, and decided on suspend eight of the Sophomores. Messrs. Jackson, Boston; Charles Emerson, Staten Island; Augustus Allsop; A. C. Harris, Boston; Philadelphia; John L. Ward, Salem; Charles F. Feering, New York; J. T. Kilbreth, Cincinnati; H. J. Edwards, Boston. Jackson was dismissed for two years; the others for one year.

When the Sophs heard of this, they hired a wagon, placed the suspended students in it, and drew them through the streets of Cambridge. Opposite Professor Felton's house, they gave three cheers for Jackson, and called, lustily, for a speech. Afterward they cut the ropes with which they had drawn the wagon into small pieces, and formed a procession, wearing the pieces of rope in their button-holes. Next day the suspended students were notified that they must leave College. Over one hundred Sophs met them with cheers, and groans for the Faculty. They attempted to draw them through the college grounds in a carriage, but President Felton had the gates fastened; they, however, succeeded in getting in a carriage, and drew their suspended associates opposite Mr. Felton's house, where they gave groans for him.

THE CHAIRMAN'S DAUGHTER.

PART I.

MR. HARDMAN SELBY was a great man in his own district. He had been in Congress, and was very rich, very dictatorial, and very ill-tempered. He had been long a widower, with one child, Annette Selby was ten years ago, a beautiful girl. She was doated on by her father, who provided for her every luxury she desired. Happy Annette Selby!

The sins of the fathers are visited upon the children. Unfortunately, Selby was in his youth awful to look upon, terrific to be near. In his fits of passion, Annette Selby would tremble.

Well, all around were well-high perfect slaves; so what matter? Tenants, dependents, servants, preached and, cowed, obeyed Selby. There was no the father's wrath and the daughter's vehemence did no great harm, save to themselves, mentally and bodily.

Annette had just turned twenty, when, one day, her father intimated to her that Captain Wyerly would be their guest for a few weeks. The Captain came. He was an attractive, well-educated man of wonderful powers of address in love with Annette. Every man fell in love with her at first sight, and remained in love with her until she showed her colors, and then he immediately withdrew. But Captain Wyerly had to pass half a dozen weeks with Annette, whether he would or no. For Mr. Selby's commands the Captain Wyerly was not only to love Annette, but to marry her; and for Mr. Selby's will not to be carried out! Mercy!

Things took the proper course. The lady and gentleman acted with perfect propriety. Mr. Selby's revolution was implicitly fulfilled. Now, who was Captain Wyerly? Oh, of course, every thing that was satisfactory. He was the only nephew of that fearfully-wealthy old bachelor, Sir John Lorby, and Sir John had just had notice to go where none of his bullion could follow him.

"I am sorry to say, Sir, that I must leave you, and that immediately," said Captain Wyerly, coming down to breakfast one morning with an open letter in his hand. "Sir John is at the point of death."

Of course expressions of sympathy were the response; but, to tell the truth, there was a smile of satisfaction on the faces of both father and daughter as they uttered them.

"You will return to us as soon as you can."

"Most certainly I will."

"You will have a great deal to attend to, remember, Captain," said Mr. Selby, with a most serious property as Sir John's, much labor will be needed to arrange all things, and this labor must devolve—"

"Upon me," said the Captain. "There is no one else, you know."

"Not a single other relative, I believe." (Mr. Selby had devoted months to the satisfying himself of the point.)

"Not one; and, what is more, I believe he has never had the slightest affection for any thing or any one but himself, save myself and his bulldog."

"A kind, good soul," murmured Mr. Selby, without the least touch of irony in his tone. "Farewell, Captain, for a short time; and then return to receive the love of your abode."

This remark referred to the Captain's having been formally recognized by her father as Annette's future husband. "Is not Annette herself—had she truly accepted him? With her whole heart—he strong, passionate, tender, brave man. His was a determined will, and he had conquered here. She was, in the most absolute sense, his.

A fortnight passed. The scene was again the breakfast-room; but this time it was Mr. Selby who appeared with the open letter. What was the matter? Annette's face grew pale, and tried in vain to speak. Annette took the letter. It conveyed startling news. Sir John Lorby was dead. Captain Wyerly was dead then it came to light that many years ago he had been secretly married to his washer-woman, who now appeared as his widow, with four children. It was all revealed in the will, and the property, save a legacy to Captain Wyerly, was left entirely to the late Sally Mobbs, now Lady Lorby.

For some minutes father and daughter gazed at each other without speaking.

"He never enters the house again," growled Mr. Selby. "Annette, you must foster it."

It was not easy to see where the imposture lay as regarded the Captain. So thought Annette, and in her love for him said, "The Gold had no influence with me. Pennilees though he be, I will not forsake him."

Mr. Selby cried to her father. Discussions, she knew, would be worse than useless. There must be sacrifice with Annette.

Then swiftly there passed communications which had these results: a secret preparation, many tears, heartaches, fainting fits, private marriage, a rousing, as of a maddened lion, which almost shook the walls of Selby House.

Then there never came the usual appeal for forgiveness. It was unanswered. A year passed, and there came a most sorrowful letter. The treacherous husband had gone no one knew whither, and the stricken wife and sorrowing daughter had left Selby House for a garret in London. To that letter went this reply:

"You should have known me better than to apply to me. I find the birds at our parlor window as we used to do of old. I would not give you a loaf of bread to save you from the work-house. Each Saturday old blind Billy still runs from me the six-pence you used to put into his hand when you were my daughter Annette. I would not now give you, yourself, sixpence to screen you from a prison. Trouble me no more—begone!"

No more applications came after this, and Mr. Selby went abroad for several years.

PART II.

It was a drear November day, foggy and wretched. Every body within doors drew close to the fireside, and marveled at the misery that had no shelter from the storm. And the snow fell, and the keen blast causes the house to rock, and the very incarnation of horror seems abroad, seeking whom it may destroy, and teach from out of all poor wayfarers whom he may meet with, we, all of us, save or lose, even as in the world can save those such as lowly and poverty-stricken from utter desperation and raving madness.

A woman, apparently in the last stage of distress, with an infant in her arms, staggered into a Relief Office.

"Now, what is it you want?" inquired a surly functionary from behind a counter, as though any body finding food, could be for rent! Were an idea never for a moment occurring to his mind.

"I want bread. I starve;" was the reply, in a hoarse voice.

"If you had bought a penny loaf instead of that last glass of gin," suggested the acute official, "it would be there yet. Come, you've been good, and needn't have come here."

"But this is your business," replied the woman, "and so don't you meddle with it. I want bread."

"Then you won't have any."

"I'll break the windows."

"Do; and you'll go to prison."

"I tell you I'm starving. Give me a night's lodging."

The officer scanned the applicant. "You casual paupers will ruin us. There—there's an order for the work-house."

The miserable being received the order, and drawing round the unfortunate little creature on her bosom the tattered remnants of an old black shawl, staggered from the office, to journey to the work-house, which was some distance off.

Now how it came to pass none can tell, but the road to the work-house was never taken, or, if taken, was soon widely departed from. Stumbling onward through snow and mud, numbed and half-blinded, yet retaining the power to advance, and exercising it with strange determination, that forlorn woman, still hugging her child to her bosom, traveled many, many miles; and it was at the entrance of a village, a great distance from town, that she first stopped, and asked of a countryman, "the way to the house." It so happened that there was a week-house nigh at hand, and having been directed accordingly, the wanderer, with almost a last effort, reached the door, and dropped senseless. Thus she was presently found, and carried in. She was dead. Starved, and nothing whatever was found upon her, even the order for relief which had been given her having been lost in the long, sad journey. Its degree conscientiousness was partially restored, but memory seemed to have departed, and reason itself had flickered. What was to be done with such a case? The guardians of that union, like the guardians of all others, had a great dislike to any more permanent burdens than were absolutely necessary. Was there no possibility of learning where the woman was living, so that she might be relief passed to her parish?" The Relieving Officer was desired to bring up this would-be drain on the parish coffers before the board sitting in solemn conclave.

Now in this neighborhood stood Selby House, and to his mansion had lately returned Hardman Selby, Esq., after several years' absence on foreign travel. The Relieving Officer looked by his wanderings. He was stout in body, and full and flushed in face; and the village doctor shook his head, and remarked to a friend that the Squire had only come back from a long journey to take a longer, and one from which he would not return. However, the country round about manifested great delight at the reappearance of the wealthy invalid, and many kindnesses shown him, were by the wretched him Chairman of the Board of Guardians of the Poor.

It was, therefore, before Mr. Selby, as chairman, and a numerous assemblage of the Board, that Mr. Jones, the Relieving Officer, brought the poor, wretched woman. A great patch covered one eye and her left temple, which had been sorely bruised and cut when she fell at the workhouse door. Her long black hair had even partially cleansed, and no hung matted and dirty about her shoulders. She was still in the deplorable attire in which she was found, and still she grasped her infant, for she would not part with it for an instant.

"Some mystery about the case," remarked the Relieving Officer, in a low tone; "I can make nothing of her, and whether she will not or can not answer questions, I really do not know."

"Where do you come from, woman?" inquired Mr. Selby, authoritatively (in the old style, reader).

"Who asks me such a question as that?" was the counter-interrogation, and in a tone of pride which caused Mr. Selby to stare, but which only led the Relieving Officer to touch his forehead significantly.

"You are married," said one of the guardians, looking at a handsome wedding-ring on the woman's finger.

"It is so."

"Come, you must tell us something about yourself," said the Chairman, rather angrily. "Where's your husband?"

There was one of the guardians, a good-natured old gentleman, by name Mr. Potts, who was made the butt of his fellow-guardians generally. Potts clanced to be seated close by where the woman was sitting on the Chairman getting the last question, the infant in the woman's arms suddenly leaped up, and struggled toward Mr. Potts.

"Ha! my dada!" it cried, in a shrill voice.

"Hallos, Potts! hallos!" cried a number of the guardians; "what have you been about, Potts?"

Mr. Potts grew crimson at this unexpected attack, and, in his confusion, leaned forward affectionately to the child, and looked it attentively in the face.

"There can't be a question, Potts. It's the very image of you," cried a jocose guardian.

"Now, if we would all like to know who I am, and where I came from," suddenly exclaimed the woman, "I am here! I've got it in these down in a letter which I'll show to that gentleman in the chair—to no one else, only to him. I seem to think of him."

"She can have no letter," observed the Relieving Officer, "I have been searched."

"Hasn't she, though?" retorted the woman, with all that horrible look of cunning, which often characterizes madness. And down amongst her masses of hair she drew forth a very soiled piece of paper, which she handed mysteriously to the Chairman.

Mr. Selby examined it through his eye-glass.

"I can make out a word or two," he said. "Do you mind some one else reading it? It isn't a love-letter, is it?"

"No, it isn't a love-letter," said the woman.

"Ay! he may read it!" (seeing the letter handed to Mr. Potts).

Slowly Mr. Potts, you read aloud," said the Chairman; "but stay, don't do it if you find it hits you in the eye toward another person in the room. Stop, Mr. Potts," and Mr. Selby laughed more heartily than he had done for many a day, and the guardians joined.

Mr. Potts, half angry, and so confused that he hardly knew what he was doing, then read, in a loud tone, the following letter:

"You should have known me better than to apply to me. I find the birds at our parlor window as we used to do of I feed the birds at our parlor window as we used to do of old. I would not give you a loaf of bread to save you from the work-house. Each Saturday old blind Billy still has from me the six-pence you used to put into his hand when you were my daughter Annette. I would not now give you, yourself, sixpence to screen you from a prison. Trouble me no more—begone!"

Mr. Selby, who during the reading of the letter had seemed bewildered, at its close sprung toward the woman, and holding her by both arms (she looking vacantly in his face the while) gazed at her intently. He then turned quietly, as though to walk back to his seat, when he encountered that foe who is always spying and dodging after every living being that walks the earth—Death. He fell, and was gone.

The Board broke up in the utmost alarm and confusion. Slowly the light which had first entered hazily into the mind of Mr. Potts shone upon the other members.

All Mr. Selby's property passed by his will to different charities. What was to be done with that poor outcast? Her case was inquired into by a few friends of her girlhood; but guilt and misery came into view so strongly, that they shrank back in horror. Ultimately an arrangement was made for her in a Pauper Lunatic Asylum, where she was received under a slightly altered name, and treated with special kindness and consideration.

But she won't need any body's kindness long. The same disease of the heart, which killed her father, is killing her. She will be at rest soon.

SALEM ROAD.

'Twas near twilight as I strolled
Down the Salem turnpike road:
On Chelsea beach a sea of gold,
That from the sinking sun was rolled
In a million ripples glowed.

On the lonesome marsh I heard,
Borne along the salted air,
The piping of the feeding bird,
By the roaming cattle stirred,
Shrilly piping here and there.

When at twilight near the sea,
E'er I hear the cries of birds,
They sound very sad to me—
Sadder than all else can be,
Plaintive music—weeping words.

For they straightway bring to mind
Twilight hours when she and I
Down the self-same road would wind,
With our arms and hands entwined,
Gazing idly at the sky.

Gazing at the setting sun,
Ruby clouds on sapphire hurled,
Framed in vapors golden-dun,
In fantastic mouldings run,
Jewels of a giant world!

And—for then we both were poor—
We would float away in dreams—
Dreams frail fancy to allure,
Dreams as briefly to endure
As the sunset's crimson beams.

Every willow on the road
Glistened like a fairy tree,
Every petty pebble glowed
Like the jewel in the toad,
And like gold the distant sea.

And a thousand things we planned
In those pleasant twilight strolls—
Lives like those in fairy land,
Joy and peace on either hand,
And a wedding of our souls.

More than this I could recall—
That old mile-stone close to Lynn,
That in the shadow of a wall,
Backed by cedars black and tall,
Bore the distance carven in.

This was the limit of our walk;
Here, when tired, we oft would rest,
And of our fondly future talk,
Till the great evening shades would stalk
Like giant spectres, from the west.

Ah! the mile-stone still is there!
Still the numerals on its face;
But the leagues of blank despair,
And the awful years of care—
These, oh! these are measureless!

But if grief could bite like steel,
On that mile-stone might be read
All the anguish man can feel,
All those woes that never heal,
All the sorrows never said.

For she left me long ago—
Left me to a lonely life.
I, who thought she loved me so;
I, who kingly wealth would throw
Out to the winds to call her wife.

Ay! a gilded, gay gallant,
Smooth of talk and fair of face,
Summer-idling at Nahant,
With concerted love-sick rant
Led my darling to disgrace.

And I lost her. For she fled,
Withering with that fatal stain.
All her people mourned her dead,
And upon my stricken head
Sorrow sowed its silver grain.

Sadly dreaming thus I strolled
Down the Salem turnpike road:
Chelsea beach in mist was rolled,
And from many an upland fold
Cattle through the twilight lowed.

Was it fancy? Did I dream?
There, hard by the mile-stone white,
I beheld a garment stream,
And I saw a pale face gleam,
Lit by eyes as black as night.

Hearts are quicker than all eyes,
And to ours the thickening gloom
Was like day. I saw her rise,
Heaving with inward agonies,
Like a corpse from out the tomb.

Ere I could my sense regain,
At my feet she prostrate lay;
Weeping such a bitter rain,
Uttering, oh! such groans of pain,
That I could not turn away.

Though she never could be mine,
That she could be God's I knew.
Few can tread the rigid line—
Mercy is a thing divine—
Too may crave for mercy too.

Would you question was I right?
Ask the men of Norfolk town
Of that year of awful blight,
When Azrael in the night
Winged with pestilence came down.

And they'll tell to you a tale—
Tell it too with reverent air,
Of a lady tall and pale,
Who, when Death was on the gale,
Moved in mercy every where.

And they'll show an humble grave,
With not even a tell-tale stone
Notice from the world to crave;
Only there some pale flowers wave,
By a pitying Christian sown.

But her lesson is not dead,
Though her troublous life is o'er.
I remember One who said,
When a lost one bowed her head,
"Woman, go and sin no more."

CHAPTER III.—Continued.

SOMETHING clicked in his throat, as if he had works in him like a clock, and was going to strike. And he smeared his ragged, rough sleeve over his eyes.

Pitying his condition, and watching him as he gradually settled down upon the pie, I made bold to say, "I am glad you enjoy it."

"Did you speak?"

"I said I was glad you enjoyed it."

"Thankee, my boy. I do."

I had often watched a large dog of ours eating his food; and I now noticed a decided similarity between the dog's way of eating and the man's. The man took strong, sharp, sudden bites, just like the dog. He swallowed, or rather gnawed up, every mouthful too soon and too fast; and he looked sideways here and there while he ate, as if he thought there was danger of somebody's coming to take the pie away. He was altogether too unsettled in his mind over it to appreciate it comfortably, I thought, or to have any body to dine with him, without making a chop with his jaws at the visitor. In all of which particulars he was very like the dog.

"You won't leave any of it for him," said I, timidly, after a silence during which I had hesitated as to the politeness of making the remark. "There's no more to be got where that came from." It was the certainty of this fact that impelled me to offer the hint.

"Leave for him? Who's him?" said my friend, stopping in his crunching of pie-crust.

"The young man. That you spoke of. That was hid with you."

"Oh, ah!" he returned, with something like a gruff laugh. "Him? Yes, yes! He don't want no victles."

"I thought he looked as if he did," said I.

The man stopped eating, and regarded me with the closest scrutiny and the greatest surprise.

"Looked? When?"

"Just now?"

"Where?"

"Yonder," said I, pointing; "over there, where I found him nodding asleep, and thought it was you."

He held me by the collar and stared at me so, that I began to think his first idea about cutting my throat had revived.

"Dressed like you, you know, only with a hat," I explained, trembling; "and—and"—I was very anxious to put it delicately—"and with—the same reason for wanting to borrow a file. Didn't you hear the gun last night?"

"Then there was firing!" he said to himself.

"I wonder you shouldn't have been sure of that," I returned, "for we heard it up at home, and that's further away, and we were shut in besides."

"Why, see now!" said he. "When a man's alone on these flats, with a light head and a light stomach, perishin' of cold and want, he hears nothin' all night but guns firin', and voices callin'. Hears? He sees the soldiers with their red coats, lighted up by their torches carried afore, closin' in round him. Hears his own name called, hears himself challenged, hears the rattle of the muskets, hears the orders, 'Make ready! Present! Cover him steady, men!' and is laid hands on, and there's nothing! Why, if I see one pursuing party last night coming up in order, 'Damn 'em, with their tramp, tramp,' I see a hundred. And as to firin'! Why, I see the mist shake with the cannon, when it was broad day. But this man"—he had said all the rest as if he had forgotten me by being there—"did you notice any thing in him?"

"He had a bruised face," said I, recalling what I had hardly knew I knew.

"Not here?" exclaimed the man, striking his left cheek with the flat of his hand.

"Yes! There!"

"Yours is like P" He crammed what little food was left into the pockets of his gray jacket. "Show me the way you went. I'll pull him down like a blood-hound. Curse this iron on his leg, which has an old chafe upon it and was bloody, but which he handled as roughly as if it had no more feeling in it than the file. I was very much afraid of him again, now that he had worked himself into this fierce hurry, and I was likewise very much afraid of keeping away from home any longer. I told him I must go, but he took no notice, so I thought the best thing I could do was to slip off. The last I saw of him, his head was bent over his leg, and he was working hard at his fetter, muttering impatient imprecations at it and at his leg. The last I heard of him, I left behind in the mist to listen, and the file was still going.

CHAPTER IV.

I FULLY expected to find a Constable in the kitchen, waiting to take me up. But not only was there no Constable there, but Mrs. Joe Gargery had yet been made of the robbery. Mrs. Joe was prodigiously busy in getting the house ready for the festivities of the day, and Joe had been put upon the kitchen door-step to keep him out of the dust-pan—an article into which it is destiny always led him sooner or later when my sister was vigorously reaping the floors of her establishment.

"And where the deuce ha' you been?" was Mrs. Joe's Christmas salutation, when I and my conscience showed ourselves.

I said I had been down to hear the Carols. "Ah! well!" observed Mrs. Joe, "you've been a deal more worse." "Not a doubt of it," I thought.

"Perhaps if I warn't a blacksmith's wife, and (what's the same thing) a slave with her apron never off, I should have been to hear the Carols," said Mrs. Joe. "I'm rather partial to Carols myself, and that's the best of reasons for my never hearing any."

Joe, who had ventured into the kitchen after me as the dust-pan retired before us, drew the back of his hand across his nose with a conciliatory air when Mrs. Joe darted a look at him, and, when her eyes were withdrawn, secretly crossed his two forefingers, and exhibited them to me, as our token that Mrs. Joe was in a cross temper. This was so much the outward state, that Joe and I would often, for weeks together, be, as to our fingers, like monumental Crusaders as to their legs.

We were to have a superb dinner, consisting of a leg of pickled pork, and greens, and a pair of roast stuffed fowls. A handsome mince-pie had been made yesterday morning (which accounted for the mince-meat not being missed), and the pudding was already on the boil. These extensive arrangements occasioned us to be out of unceremoniously in respect of breakfast, "for I an't," said Mrs. Joe, "I an't a going to have no cramming and gorging and snorting up now, with what I've got before me, I promise you!"

As we had our slices served out—as if we were two thousand troops on a forced march, instead of a man and boy at home; and we took gulps of milk and water, with apologetic countenances, from a jug on the dresser. In the mean time Mrs. Joe put clean white curtains up, and tacked a new flowered flounce across the wide chimney to replace the old one, and uncovered the little state parlor across the passage, which was never uncovered at any other time, but passed the rest of the year in a cool haze of silver paper, which was extended to the four little white crockery poodles on the mantelshelf, each with a black nose, and a basket of flowers in his mouth, and each the counterpart of the other. Mrs. Joe was a very clean housekeeper, but had an exquisite art of making her cleanliness more uncomfortable and unacceptable than dirt itself. Cleanliness is next to Godliness, and some people do the same by their religion.

My sister having so much to do, was going to church vicariously; that is to say, Joe and I were going. In his working clothes, Joe was a well-knit, characteristic-looking blacksmith; in his holiday clothes, he was more like a scarecrow in good circumstances than any thing else. Nothing that he wore fitted him or seemed to belong to him, and every thing that he wore then grazed him. On the present festive occasion he emerged from his room, when the bells were going, the picture of misery in a full suit of Sunday penitentials. As to me, I think my sister must have had some general idea that I was a young offender whom an Accuchevar Policeman had taken up (on my birthday), and delivered over to her to be dealt with according to the outraged majesty of the law. I was always treated as if I had insisted on being born in opposition to the dictates of reason, religion, and morality, and against the dissuading arguments of my best friends; even when I was taken to have a new suit of clothes, the tailor had orders to make them like a kind of Reformatory, and on no account to let me have the use of my limbs.

Joe and I going to church, therefore, must have been a moving spectacle for compassionate minds. Yet what I suffered outside was nothing to what I underwent within. The terrors that had assailed me whenever Mrs. Joe had gone near the pantry or out of the room, were only to be equaled by the remorse with which my mind dwelt on what my hands had done. Under the weight of my wicked secret I pondered whether the Church would be powerful enough to shield me from the vengeance of the terrible young man, if I divulged it to that establishment. I conceived the idea that the time when the bans were read and when the clergyman said, "Ye are now to declare it!" would be the time for me to rise and propose a private audience in the vestry. I am far from being quite sure that I might not have astonished our small congregation by resorting to this extreme measure, but for its being Christmas Day and no Sunday.

Mr. Wopsle, the clerk at church, was to dine with us; and Mr. Hubble the wheel-wright and Mrs. Hubble; and Uncle Pumblechook (Joe's uncle, but Mrs. Joe appreciated him), who was a well-to-do corn-chandler in the nearest town, and drove his own chaise-cart. The dinner hour was half-past one. When Joe and I got home we found the table laid, and Mrs. Joe dressed, and the dinner dressing, and the front door unlocked (it never was at any other time) for the company to enter by, and every thing most splendid. And still, not a word of the robbery.

The time came without bringing with it any relief to my feelings, and the company came. Mr. Wopsle, united to a Roman nose and a large bald forehead, had a deep sonorous voice which he was proud of; indeed it was understood among his acquaintance that if you could only give him his head he would read the clergyman into fits; he himself confessed that if the Church was "thrown open," meaning to competition, he would not despair of making his mark in it. The Church not being "thrown open," he was, as I have said, our clerk. But he punished the humanities tremendously; and when he gave out the psalm—always giving us the whole verse—he looked all round the congregation first, as much as to say, "You have heard my friend overhead; oblige me with your opinion of this!"

I opened the door to the company—making believe that it was a habit of ours to open that door—and I opened it first to Mr. Wopsle, next to Mr. and Mrs. Hubble, and last of all to Uncle Pumblechook. N.B. I was not allowed to call him uncle under the severest penalties.

"Mrs. Joe," said Uncle Pumblechook, who was a large, hard-breathing, middle-aged, slow man, with a mouth like a fish, dull staring eyes, and sandy hair standing upright on his head, so that he looked as if he had just been licked, and had that very moment come to, "I have brought you, as the compliments of the season —I have brought you, Mum, a bottle of sherry wine, and I have brought you, Mum, a bottle of port wine."

Every Christmas Day he presented himself, as a profound novelty, with exactly the same words, and carrying the two bottles like dumbbells. Every Christmas Day, Mrs. Joe replied, as she now replied, "Oh, Uncle Pumblechook! This is kind!" Every Christmas Day, he retorted, as he now retorted, "It's no more than your merits. And how are you all—bobbish? And how's Sixpennorth of salt pence?" meaning me.

We dined on these occasions in the kitchen, and adjourned, for the nuts and oranges and apples, to the parlor; which was a change very like Joe's change from his working clothes to his Sunday's dress. My sister was uncommonly lively on the present occasion, and indeed was generally more gracious in the society of Mrs. Hubble than in any other company. I remember Mrs. Hubble as a little, sharp-eared person in curly sky-blue, who held a conventionally impossible position, because she had married Mr. Hubble—I don't know at what remote period—when she was much younger than he. I remember Mr. Hubble as a tough, high-shouldered, stooping old man, of a saw-dusty fragrance, with his legs extraordinarily wide apart, so that in my short and early days I always saw some miles of open country between them when I met him coming up the lane.

Among this good company I should have felt myself, even if I hadn't robbed the pantry, in a false position. Not because I was squeezed in at acute angle of the table-cloth with the table in my chest, and the Pumblechookian elbow in my eye; not because I was not allowed to speak (I didn't want to speak), nor because I was regaled with the scaly tips of the drumsticks of the fowls, and with those corners of chops of pork of which the pig, when living, had had the least reason to be vain. No; I should not have minded that, if they would only have left me alone. But they wouldn't leave me alone. They seemed to think the opportunity lost, if they failed to point the conversation at me every now and then, and stick the point into me. I might have been an unusually intimate friend in a Spanish arena: I got so smartingly touched up by these moral goads.

It began the moment we sat down to dinner. Mr. Wopsle said grace with theatrical declamation, as it now appears to me, something like a religious cross of the Ghost in Hamlet with Richard the Third—and ended with the very observation with which that we might be truly grateful. Upon which my sister instantly fixed me with her eye, and said, in a low, reproachful voice, "Do you hear that? Be grateful."

"Especially," said Mr. Pumblechook, "be grateful, boy, to them which brought you up by hand."

Mrs. Hubble shook her head, and contemplating me with a mournful presentiment that I should come to no good, asked, "Why is it that the young are never grateful?" This mystery seemed too much for the company until Mr.

"OH, UN—CLE PUM—BLE—CHOOK! THIS IS KIND!"

Hubble tersely solved it by saying, "Naturally vicious." Every body then murmured "Ah!" and "True!" and looked at me in a particular, I unpleasant and personal manner.

Joe's station and influence were something feebler (if possible) when there was company than when there was none. But he always sided and abetted when he could, in some way of his own, and he always did so in dinner-time by giving me gravy, if there were any. There being plenty of gravy to-day, Joe spooned into my plate, at this point, about half a pint.

A little later on in the dinner, Mr. Wopsle reviewed the sermon with some severity, and intimated, in the usual hypothetical case of the Church being "thrown open," what kind of sermon he would have given them. After favoring them with some heads of that discourse, he remarked that he considered the subject of the day's homily ill chosen; which was the less excusable, he added, when there were so many subjects "going about."

"True again," said Uncle Pumblechook. "You've hit it—plenty of subjects going about, for them as know how to put salt upon their tails. That's what's wanted. A man needn't go far to find a subject if he's ready with his salt-box." Mr. Pumblechook, with the air of a short interval of deep reflection, "look at Pork alone. There's a subject! If you want a subject, look at Pork!"

"True, Sir. Many a moral for the young," returned Mr. Wopsle; and I knew from his going to bring me in before he said it, "might be deducted from that text."

("Just listen to this," said my sister to me, in a severe parenthesis.)

Joe gave me some more gravy.

"Seems to me," said Mr. Wopsle, in his deepest voice, and pointing his fork at my blushes as if he were sentencing me to the Christian stake, "seems were the companions of the prodigal. The gluttony of Swine is set before us as an example to the young." (I thought this pretty well in him who had been praising up the pork for being so plump and juicy.) "What is detestable in a pig is more detestable in a boy."

"Or girl," suggested Mr. Hubble.

"Or girl, certainly," assented Mr. Wopsle, rather irritably; "but there is no girl present."

"Besides," said Mr. Pumblechook, turning sharp on me, "I think what you've got to be grateful for. If you'd been borne a Squeaker—"

"He was, if ever a child was," said my sister, most emphatically.

Joe gave me some more gravy.

"Well, but I mean a four-footed squeaker," said Mr. Pumblechook. "If you had been born such, would you have been here now? Not you—"

"Unless in that form," said Mr. Wopsle, nodding slowly at the dish.

"But I don't mean in that form, Sir," returned Mr. Pumblechook, who had an objection to being interrupted; "I mean enjoying himself with his elders and betters, and improving himself with their conversation, and sitting in the lap of luxury. Would he have been doing that? No, he wouldn't. And what would have been your destination?" turning on me again. "You would have been disposed of for so many shillings, according to the market price of that article, and Dunstable, the butcher, would have come up to you as you lay in your straw, and he would have whipped you under his left arm, and with his right he would have tucked up his frock to get a penknife from out of his waistcoat-pocket, and he would have shed your blood and had your life. No bringing up by hand then. Not a bit of it!"

Joe offered me more gravy, which I was afraid to take.

"He was a world of trouble to you, Ma'am," said Mrs. Hubble, commiserating my sister.

"Trouble?" echoed my sister; "trouble?" And then entered on a fearful catalogue of all the illnesses I had been guilty of, and all the acts of disobedience I had committed, and all the high places I had tumbled from, and all the low places I had tumbled into, and all the injuries I had done myself, and all the times she had wished me in my grave, and I had conta-maciously refused to go there.

I think Mrs. Hubman must have aggravated one another very much with their noses. Perhaps they became the restless people they were in consequence. Anyhow, Mr. Wopsle's voice rose so aggravated me, during the recital of my misdemeanors, that I should have liked all the while to bowl him. But all I had endured up to this time was nothing in comparison with the awful feeling that took possession of me when the pause was broken which ensued upon my sister's recital, and in which pause every body had looked at me (as I felt deeply convicted) with indignation and abhorrence.

"Yet," said Mr. Pumblechook, leading the company gently back to the theme from which they had strayed, "Pork—regarded as biled—is rich, too; ain't it?"

"Have a little brandy, uncle?" said my sister.

O Heavens, it had come at last! He would find it was weak, he would say it was washy, and I was lost! I held tight to the leg of the table with both hands, and awaited my doom.

My sister went for the stone bottle, came back with the stone bottle, and poured his brandy out, no one else taking any. The wretched man trifled with his glass—took it up, looked at it through the light, put it down—prolonged my misery. All this time Mrs. Joe and Joe were busily clearing the table for the pie and pudding.

I couldn't keep my eyes off him. Always holding tight by the leg of the table with my hands and feet, I saw the miserable creature finger his glass playfully, take it up, smell it, throw his head back, and drink the brandy off. Instantly afterward the company were seized with unspeakable consternation, owing to his springing to his feet, turning round several times in an appalling spasmodic, hooping-cough dance, and rushing out at the door; he then became visible through the window violently stamping and expectorating, making the most hideous faces, and apparently out of his mind.

I held on tight, while Mrs. Joe and Joe ran to him. I didn't know how I had done it, but I had no doubt I had murdered him somehow. In my dreadful state I felt that this was all of a piece with my having been sent for, surveying the company all round, as if they had disagreed with him, and sentencing him alive with the one significant gasp, "Tar!"

I had fled up the bottle from the tar-water, in the hope that he would be worse by-and-by. I moved the table, like a Medium of the present day, by the force of my superstitious will.

"Tar!" cried my sister, in amazement. "Why, however could it come there?"

But Uncle Pumblechook, who was omnipotent in that kitchen, wouldn't hear the word, wouldn't hear the subject mentioned, imperiously waved it all away with his hand, and asked for hot gin-and-water. My sister, who had begun to be alarmingly meditative, had to deploy herself actively in getting the gin, the hot water, the sugar, and the lemon-peel, and mixing them. Fresh as the task was, I was saved. I still held on the leg of the table, but clutched it now with the fervor of gratitude.

By degrees I became calm enough to release my grasp and partake of pudding. Mr. Pumblechook partook of pudding. All partook of pudding. The conversation originated, and Mr. Pumblechook had begun to beam under the genial influence of the gin-and-water, I began to think I should get over the day when my sister said to Joe, "Clear plates—cold."

I clenched the leg of the table again immediately, and pressed it to my bosom as if it had been the companion of my youth and friend of my soul. I foresaw what was coming, and I felt that this time I really was gone.

"You must taste," said my sister, addressing the guests with her best grace, "you must really taste, to finish with, such a delightful and delicious present to Uncle Pumblechook!"

Must they! Let them not hope it!

"You must know," said my sister, rising, "it's a pie—a savory pork-pie."

The company murmured their compliments; and Uncle Pumblechook, with a smile of loving deserved well of his fellow-creatures, and having distinguished himself by his gift, said, vivaciously, all things considered, "Well, Mrs. Joe, we'll do our best endeavors; let us have a cut at this same pie."

My sister went out to get it. I heard her steps proceed to the pantry. I saw Mr. Pumblechook balance his knife. I smelled sweetening appetite in the Roman nostrils of Mr. Wopsle. I heard Mr. Hubble remark that "a bit of sage and onion would lay very handy hot cutting and do no harm," and I heard Joe say, "You shall have some, Pip." I have never been absolutely certain whether I uttered a shrill cry of terror merely in spirit, or in the bodily hearing of the company. I felt that I could bear no more, and that I must run away. I released the leg of the table, and ran for my life.

But Joe ran further than the house door, for there I ran head foremost into a party of soldiers with their muskets, one of whom held out a pair of handcuffs to me, saying: "Here you are, look sharp, come on!"

BUFFALO, November 16, 1859.

MR. A. J. MATTHEWS,
Dear Sir:—I send you a brief statement of the effects of Watson's Neuralgia King upon myself, with permission to use it for the benefit of others.

For the last three or four years, I have been afflicted with Neuralgia and Rheumatism, in the back of my head, neck and shoulders. My sufferings at times, were indescribable, and I had tried various prescriptions and remedies without any effect, when I was persuaded to commence using the Neuralgia King, and from the first was entirely relieved from pain, and after the use of less than two bottles, found myself entirely cured, having had no return of the disease.

Yours, truly, JAS. WEIGEL.

Jonas Whitcomb's Remedy.—Prepared from a German receipt obtained by the late Jonas Whitcomb, in Europe. It is well known here as the most effectual remedy in the case, when all other appliances of medical skill had been abandoned by the patient as despair. In no case of purely asthmatic character has it failed to give immediate relief, and it has effected many permanent cures. Within the past two years this remedy has been used in thousands of cases with astonishing and uniform success. It contains no poisonous or injurious properties whatever; an infant may take it with perfect safety.

The following testimonials are conclusive as to its efficacy:

Unsolicited Testimony of a Pennsylvania Merchant.

LYCEMORE, Pa., Sept. 5th, 1860.

MESSRS. JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.: I take pleasure in stating the great beneficial effects produced by Jonas Whitcomb's Remedy for Asthma on my wife. She has been severely afflicted with this most distressing disease for over four years, and could obtain no relief by using or known remedy, till she complied to sit up—for four or five nights in succession. She had almost constant medical attendance, but still grew worse. I supposed her incurable. I saw a notice of your valuable medicine in the Pittsburg Christian Advocate, and procured a few bottles. The effect was truly wonderful in relieving her from the painful disease. She is now almost well, and I have not the slightest doubt but that it will effect a complete cure in her case. I am engaged in the mercantile business, and therefore I tell the remedy from my own recommendation. Send one half dozen bottles by Adams & Co.'s Express, and I will forward money on receipt of goods.

Very truly yours, DAVID MENSCH.

Cure of a New York Lady.

Editors Burnal New Yorker: Seeing an inquiry in the Rural for a cure for that distressing disease, the Asthma, I write to let you know that I have what has almost cured me.

I have had the spasmodic asthma fifteen years, and never found any medicine that would prevent an attack when it was coming on until I commenced taking "Jonas Whitcomb's Remedy for Asthma." I commenced taking this remedy eighteen months ago, and have not had a severe paroxysm since.

Saltpetre is present relief, but no cure. =Whitcomb's Remedy has done for me all that it is recommended to do.

MRS. ESTER BERLY.

Eddytown, Yates County, N. Y., May 15, 1859.

From a Methodist Clergyman.

WARMINGTO', VT., May 13, 1857.

Mr. Burnett:—I take pleasure in stating the wonderful effects of "Whitcomb's Remedy for the Asthma," on my wife. She has suffered for four years with what you can describe, with the spasmodic form of that terrible disease. As often as ten or twenty times per night she was brought to the very gates of death, requiring two or three watchers sometimes for several days and nights in succession. At times, for hours, it would seem as if one time she was for the last. We were obliged to open doors and windows in mid-winter, and to resort to every expedient that affection could devise to keep her alive. At one time she was so far gone that her physician could not count her pulse. At length I heard of "Whitcomb's remedy." It acted like a charm. It enabled her to sleep quietly in a few minutes.

* * * * I am a methodist clergyman, stationed here. I shall be happy to answer any inquiries respecting her case, and may recommend the future use of the foregoing facts that will benefit the afflicted. Yours, truly,

KIMBALL HADLEY.

Concentrated Leaven

For making

Bread, Tea Cakes,

All Kinds of Pastry, &c.,

MANUFACTURED BY

EDW. CHAMBERLIN & CO.,

Proprietors of Shawmut Chemical Works,

NO. 83 INDIA ST., BOSTON.

Concentrated Leaven

Is the result of careful chemical research.

Bread, &c.,

Of all kinds, made by using it, is light, more digestible and nutritious, has an agreeable natural taste, is less liable to sour, will retain its moisture longer than by any other process, and the whole preparation for the oven need not exceed ten minutes.

It has been reliable, and is available in places and at times when yeast is not within reach, so as to use in all climates, and under all circumstances, it may be adopted, thus obviating all difficulty of procuring yeast or other ferment which is frequently of an inferior quality, rendering the bread more or less unwholesome.

It is valuable as regards economy, as a saving is effected in the flour of not less than 16 per cent. In the common process, much of the substance of the flour is lost by being converted into carbonic acid gas, and the leaven is incurred solely for the purpose of generating gas to raise the dough. By using CONCENTRATED LEAVEN this waste is avoided, and the gas obtained in a manner in a readily effective. Fermentation destroys a part of the flour or meal; a barrel of flour, weighing 196 pounds, when properly made makes about 250 pounds of bread, given by this process 200 pounds, thus affording a very important saving. As economic to the directions on each package, any person capable of ordinary attention may conduct the process, and the result will invariably be highly satisfactory.

Certificate from Dr. Hayes,

ASSAYER TO THE STATE OF MASSACHUSETTS.

I have analyzed the Concentrated Leaven manufactured by Messrs. Edw. Chamberlin & Co., with reference to its purity and efficiency of action in producing the effect of yeast in distending dough, and thereby rendering it light for making bread. This article is skillfully compounded, from perfectly pure materials. It raises the dough without fermenting the sugar or any other principle in the flour, perfectly, and the same weight of flour will produce more loaves, and a better bread than can be obtained through the old method, while the bread will remain moist much longer, and serve all the purposes of fine pastry cooks. The experiments made by me confirm the statements made by the manufacturers, and in this compound a variety of valuable approval and extended use. Respectfully,

A. A. HAYES, STATE ASSAYER.

How to use it.

Breakfast and Tea Rolls.

Three teaspoonfuls of Leaven to one quart of flour; mix thoroughly by passing two or three times through a sieve; rub in a piece of butter of half the size of an egg, and make the paste with cold milk or water (milk is preferable) barely stiff enough to permit rolling out. Much kneading should be avoided. Cut into desired form, and place immediately in a hot oven and bake quickly.

Loaf Bread.

The same proportion of Leaven and flour sifted together as above. Omit the butter, and make the paste thick enough to kneed into a loaf, and bake immediately in a slow oven.

Buckwheat Cakes.

Flour and milk sufficient to make one quart of batter; add one egg; then three teaspoonfuls of Leaven; beat to a froth and cook quick.

Sponge Cake.

Two cups of white sugar, beaten with the yolks of six eggs—the whites of six eggs beaten to a froth; then beat all together; add three cups of sifted flour, one cup of water, and three teaspoonfuls of Leaven; flavor with two teaspoonfuls of essence of lemon, and bake in a quick oven.

Corn Cake.

One pint each of flour and Indian meal, and three teaspoonfuls of Leaven, well sifted together; add one gill of molasses and two eggs; mix them with milk, and bake in a slow oven.

Cup Cake.

Five cups of flour and three teaspoonfuls of Leaven, sifted together; add one cup of butter, two of sugar, and two eggs all well beaten together; mix with milk, and add a cup of raisins, and spice to suit the taste.—Bake about half an hour.

Ladies' Cake.

Three-quarters of a pound of flour and four teaspoonfuls of Leaven, sifted together; one pound of sugar and six ounces of butter, beaten to a cream; the whites of eight eggs, well beaten, and the juice of one lemon, mixed with milk.

Webster Cake.

Five cups of flour, three teaspoonfuls of Leaven, three cups of sugar, one of butter, one of milk, and two eggs; fruit and spice to the taste. Bake about half an hour.

Muffins.

Three teaspoonfuls of Leaven, one quart of flour, and a little salt sifted together; make a thick batter with milk, and bake in rings.

Apple Pudding.

Pare and slice eight apples, sift three teaspoonfuls of Leaven with one quart of flour; put in a piece of butter half the size of an egg; mix with cold water to a paste; roll out about an inch thick; put the apple into the crust with a little cinnamon; put into a cloth, allowing room to swell one-third; boil one hour and a half.

Highland Cake.

Two teaspoonfuls of Leaven and one cup of flour sifted together; two eggs well beaten; two cups of milk; two cups of sugar and one of butter; add flour enough to mix as stiff as common cup cake, and bake about half an hour.

See directions in each package for making Graham Bread, Boston Brown Bread, Dumplings, Chambers Street Cake, Sponge Cake, Jumbles, Tiptoe Cake, Soft Sugar Ginger Bread, Hard Sugar Ginger Bread, Silver Cake, Doughnuts, Butter Pudding, Quaker Cake, Gold Cake, Japanese Cake, Union Cake, and every variety of Pastry.

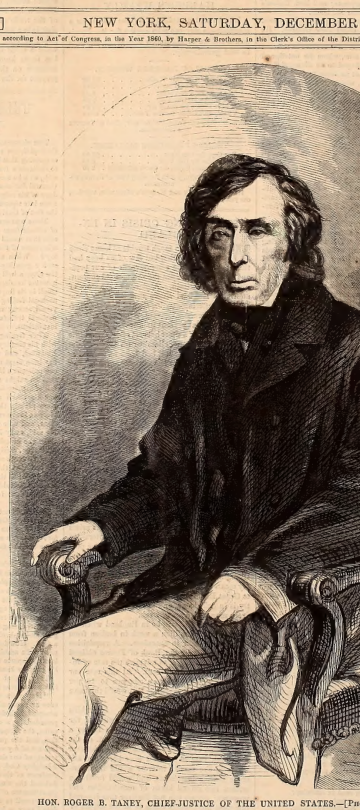
ROGER B. TANEY,

CHIEF-JUSTICE OF THE U. S.

It is understood that the Hon. ROGER BROOKE TANEY, who has been for many years Chief-Justice of the United States, is about to resign his office; we take this opportunity of laying his portrait before our readers.

He was born on 17th March, 1777, in Calvert County, Maryland, to which State his family had immigrated two centuries ago. He is consequently eighty-three years of age at present, and is fairly entitled to an honorable retirement.

He was educated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, and admitted to the bar at Annapolis, Maryland, in the spring of 1799, sixty-one years ago. His first attempts were made in Calvert County, from which county, soon after his settlement there as a lawyer, he was sent to the State Senate. He served one term, then returned to Frederick, and devoted himself to his private practice. In 1823 his practice had improved, and his reputation had risen so high that he felt justified in removing to Baltimore, where he has resided ever since. In 1827 he was appointed Attorney-General of Maryland—an office which he held four years. Up to this time Mr. Taney's career had been one of quiet, uninterrupted success. Though a politician, he had taken no angry part in political strife, and enjoyed the respect of his political foes and friends alike. He had met with not a single rebuff or check in his public life. A startling change in his career was now at hand.



In June, 1831, he was appointed ATTORNEY-General of the United States, and entered upon the discharge of the duties of the office. It was the period of the great Bank war: General Jackson had decided upon his course, and was only waiting for a favorable opportunity to carry it out. His Cabinet were unconscious of his intentions. In September, 1833, he determined to carry them out, and instructed Mr. Duane, the Secretary of the Treasury, to remove the public deposits from the United States Bank. Mr. Duane belonged to the Bank party. He declined to comply, and intimated that, should the President persevere in his project, he must take the responsibility of dismissing him (Mr. Duane) from office. If there was a thing General Jackson liked it was responsibility. He dismissed Mr. Duane without more ado, appointed Mr. Taney Secretary of the Treasury, and had the deposits removed forthwith. It seemed as though Mr. Taney had sacrificed himself to stay the bolents of his chief. General Jackson, well knowing the temper of the Senate, withheld Mr. Taney's nomination till the close of the session: he sent it in on the last day, and it was instantly rejected. Mr. Taney, of course, resigned forthwith, returned to Baltimore, and resumed the practice of the law. His political prospects at that time seemed gloomy enough.

General Jackson, however, was a man who did not forget. Within twelve months from the rejection of Mr. Taney by the Senate, Associate-Justice Duvall, of the United States Supreme Court, resigned his office, the President nominated Mr. Taney to fill the vacancy. This time the nomination was sent to the Senate in due time: it, too, however, had not forgiven either General Jackson or Mr. Taney, and it postponed the subject indefinitely—thus in effect rejecting it. Fortune had seemingly turned her back upon Mr. Taney.

In the midst, however, of his chagrin and disappointment, and while General Jackson was raging, in his characteristic way, at the hostility of the Senate, the astounding news reached him that Chief-Justice Marshall, of the United States Supreme Court, had suddenly died. The President acted as promptly as was his custom. He appointed Mr. Taney to fill the vacancy. And this time, in March, 1836, some changes having been made in the Senate which strengthened the President in that body, the nomination was duly confirmed. Chief-Justice Taney took his seat on the Supreme Bench at Washington in January, 1837—nearly twenty-four years ago.

As Presiding Judge of the leading Court of Justice in the United States Mr. Taney has won high fame. His decisions command general respect, and his opinions are quoted as authority not only throughout this country but in Europe also. Within the past year or two he has, after twenty years' abolution from the strife of politics, been subjected to some animadversion by members of the Republican party in consequence of the Dred Scott decision. Without entering upon the controversy involved in this celebrated case, we may close this brief sketch with the remark that, when Judge Taney shall have disappeared altogether from public life, members of all parties will unite to commend his vast learning, his unspotted integrity, and his remarkable suavity. A career of a quarter of a century upon the Bench of the Supreme Court—during which he has sworn in no less than six Presidents of the United States—has won for him an honorable place in history.

Several gentlemen are mentioned in the papers as likely to succeed Chief-Justice Taney—Mr. Black, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Cushing, of Massachusetts, etc.

HON. ROGER B. TANEY, CHIEF-JUSTICE OF THE UNITED STATES.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

FANNY'S DOOM.

FANNY ENDON, at the age of sixteen, was one of the most fascinating girls I ever knew. Brought up in strict retirement, she had a wild freedom of manner—very different indeed from what that expression would signify in the world, but extremely delightful to the few who had access to her society. Her animal spirits were excessive, and her disposition was winning, endearing. Fanny's beauty was peculiar. Her eyes were of a lustrous brown; her hair was profuse, and of a rich auburn; and her complexion of dazzling whiteness. Her mouth gave a character of exquisite sweetness to her whole face; and when the lips parted in smile and revealed her faultless teeth, Fanny Endon was irresistible.

She lived with her mother, a widow lady, in a retired part of the State of New York, and there, too, my lot for many years was cast. My days of love were gone by forever, or else I could never have withstood the bewitching charms of Fanny Endon. She had some such impression herself, for she treated me with perfect familiarity: There was only the length of a lane between her mother's house and mine, and she was as much at home in one as in the other. A morning seldom passed without finding her in my library rummaging among the books; for she had a mind attuned to fine issues, and her taste led her to history as well as to works of lighter reading. Even in her early girlhood I formed a correct estimate of Fanny's disposition; I saw that, for her, there was no medium; her life could not be a tame one; she must either be most happy or most miserable. In my sincere affection for her I became very anxious for her future welfare.

The time approached when her fate was to be fixed forever; and, unconsciously, I was in some degree its means. I happened to be staying for a few days at the house of a friend, where I met an old acquaintance whom I had not seen for many years. I was greatly charmed with him, asked him to return home with me, and he accepted the invitation.

Edward Delaine—such was his name—was at this time in the prime of youthful manhood, and his remarkable personal advantages were enhanced by an air of cultivation and intelligence. His father had not been long dead, and he had inherited considerable property. Previously he had passed some years abroad as an attaché to one of our embassies, and this had given to his education a finish that made his society very pleasing. But he had none of the coldness of the diplomat about him; his feelings were keen, and his manners were warm and eloquent. His education had tempered, not destroyed, that ardor of disposition for which he had been remarkable at school. Such was the man destined to win the heart of Fanny Endon.

The first time they met was at my house, when there were a good many people present. The conversation happened to turn on some European topic, and Delaine was appealed to. He was interested in the subject, and spoke with animation and energy. I observed, the moment, to notice Fanny. Little accustomed to the restraints of society, she allowed the admiration with which he listened to appear but too plainly on her countenance. Her head was slightly inclined backward—her eyes were keenly bent on Edward's face—and her lips were slightly parted, with an expression that told of the most intense attention. When Delaine ceased her gaze remained fixed on him for some time, as though to scan further a character of which her first knowledge pleased her so much—and, as at last she turned away, I could perceive a gentle sigh escape her. That was the first be caused her to breathe—would to God it had been the last sigh!

On that evening Delaine was not introduced to her; but he was too good a judge, and too great an admirer of beauty, not to be struck with her appearance, and to question me concerning her. After what I had noticed I felt somewhat uneasy; for, bred in the latitude of European ideas on these subjects, Delaine was, of all men, least likely to become seriously attached to a wild rustic beauty like Fanny. Still he had a good heart when he allowed it fair play, and I did not like to take advantage of so guileless and unguarded a creature.

Nevertheless his curiosity was awakened by the singularity of her manner. He had made her acquaintance with her by merely seeking to draw her out and study as her real disposition. But his interest in her soon began to assume a warmer complexion. Some circumstance or other constantly drew me to Mrs. Endon's cottage. He was to lend Fanny drawings, now to practise music with her. Whenever she walked, or rode on horseback, a frequent caution, she was sure to meet Delaine by the purest accident. Poor Fanny! Those days of dawning love were the most exquisitely happy she ever knew. She abandoned her whole soul to the new passion, and the object of it himself was no doubt startled when he discovered its strength, for he merely fancied that he had excited the interest of a favored but recent acquaintance. I am fully persuaded that, up to this time, Delaine had no intention of obtaining poor Fanny's love, and then trifling with her feelings; but the rapidity and intensity of her affection took him by surprise, and he himself became entangled before he was well aware of it.

I was alarmed at the frequency of Delaine's visits to the cottage, and availed myself of some business which called me to New York to pay a visit to his stay. We went to town together. I was detained there considerably longer than I expected, and afterward traveled into a distant part of the country before I returned home.

Upward of two months had elapsed since I left it, and now it was nearly mid-summer. I arrived at home early in the day, and determined to walk over to the cottage to see my friends. Fanny received Mrs. Endon's cottage deserved its name, for it was of moderate size, and the walls, and even the roof, in many parts, were covered with ivy. It was also a small garden in front, and, using the privilege of an old friend, I opened the gate, and walked into the parlor, which was on the ground-floor, without knocking at the door or waiting for the servant to announce me.

As I entered the room I started with extreme surprise. Fanny was seated on the sofa, and by her side was Edward Delaine! One of his arms was held in his; he was speaking with animation and rapidity, though in a low tone, while her head was drooped over her bosom, and her face bent over her bow and eyes so as to hide their expression. I knew, though I could not distinguish it. Such was the group that met my gaze as I entered Mrs. Endon's cottage. I believe I expressed my astonishment audibly, for they started, and their surprise was mingled with great confusion.

Edward was the first to recover himself, and, answering, as my exclamation of wonder at seeing him, he said that he had come to witness a trotting match which was nearly to take place.

"Humph!" I replied, "I did not know you were an amateur of horse-racing."

"Nor am I," he replied; "but my friend Reynolds made it a point with me to come."

I gave him a reproachful look. By this time Fanny also had recovered herself and greeted me with her usual warmth and cordiality. But its wonted ease and freedom were gone.

I sat down, and showed Delaine that I was determined not to leave him behind me. Finding that he could not outstay me, he rose to take leave, and went off. I asked for Mrs. Endon, and learned that she was gone to the neighboring town, and had been absent all the morning. I was at a loss how to act. On intimate terms of friendship, as I had always been with Fanny and her mother, still this was not a fitting subject for me to enlarge upon with the former. Hints and innuendoes only irritate, and do more mischief; and, yet, after sitting a short time longer, I took my leave, resolving to have a full explanation with Delaine respecting his intentions on the very first opportunity.

That opportunity never arrived. The next morning I was sent for by Mrs. Endon, and, upon reaching the cottage, to my utter astonishment and dismay, I heard that Fanny had eloped with Edward Delaine.

I could not account for such a step. Edward was his own master; in every way he was likely to prove an agreeable son-in-law to Mrs. Endon, and, if his attachment was sincere, why not openly make Fanny his wife?

Mrs. Endon sent for me as the friend of Delaine and her own. She idolized her daughter, had been her only companion for ten years, and had watched every quality of heart, mind, and temper, rising from the beautiful bud into a perfect blossom. Fanny, too, opened her mother as much as something more than of this earth; and powerful must have been the passion which could have induced her thus to leave that mother.

Mrs. Endon informed me that Edward Delaine had returned to the country about a month before, and had renewed his visits. His attentions to her daughter had become very marked, and, two nights ago, she had been alarmed and shocked at the discovery that Fanny was engaged in a clandestine correspondence with him. Fanny was seated on her bed reading a letter with such absorbing attention that she did not hear her mother enter. When she approached her, Fanny hurriedly closed and endeavored to hide the manuscript.

"I spoke to her," continued Mrs. Endon, "more in sorrow than in anger, and she seemed touched to the soul. I adjured her to abstain from every thing clandestine; it was unworthy of her; it was degrading; it was nearly allied to falsehood. She threw herself into my arms, and promised that all secret intercourse should cease. But I feel now the real meaning of her tones and looks. I am convinced that her resolve was taken—that I spoke too late. She exclaimed, 'Oh, mother!' as she withdrew from my arms, and again sinking upon my neck, wept as though her heart would break."

Here the poor old lady's own sobs prevented further utterance.

On her departure Fanny had left behind a scrap of paper, on which were written these words: "I am not weak. I am leaving you forever. Pity and forgive your poor lost child!"

I did not know how to act. To pursue the pair seemed to me hopeless. Was she had eloped with him; the evil was done; it lay in his breast to remedy it, and there alone. With bitter anxiety did we expect from each trembling express we searched the newspapers, day after day, to see if their marriage was announced. Weeks passed, and all was still suspense; and Mrs. Endon's health began to sink under her trials.

At length the mystery was solved. I received a letter from Delaine, dated New Orleans. He confessed to me the cursed truth that when he eloped with Fanny Endon he was already married—to a woman, it was true, whom he hated, and from whom he utterly hoped to be divorced—but still married. I had not patience to read his excuse of passionate love, which he urged in partial defense of his crime, and flung the letter from me in disgust. But I had one melancholy task to perform, and the sooner it was done the better.

I found Mrs. Endon sitting with her knitting in her hands, but not working; her eyes fixed, and swimming in tears. She was looking at a picture of her daughter after that happy period. As moment I entered she saw I had something to communicate.

"O God! tell me what it is. Any thing is better than suspense. Tell me the worst at once."

I then made known to her, briefly, the substance of Delaine's letter. She seemed heartstricken by this confirmation of her worst forebodings.

"Forgive her! Yes, indeed—poor, lost, dear, ever-darling child—I do, from the bottom of my heart!" she exclaimed. "Tell her this, or bring me your letter, and I will write just these words at the bottom of it—that now, this hour, I swear I must seek consolation where alone it is to be found."

I did not see Mrs. Endon for several days after this interview. When next I met her I was shocked at the awful change that had come over the poor wrought. Despair was seated in her sunken eyes, and death—the death of a broken heart—had laid its finger upon her forehead. She added me if I had written, and I answered that I had.

"Give me your paper," she said.

I placed the sheet in her hand, with a pen, and she then wrote, with a trembling hand, the words, "I forgive you, Fanny. Your Almighty Saviour, my people, my dear child!" She laid down the pen, and sank back quite exhausted upon her seat.

In conclusion, I will only add that Fanny's child not conceal from him the state of Mrs. Endon's health.

"If my thing can save her," I wrote, "it is the restoration of her daughter. Hasten, I implore you, as you value your future peace of mind forever, to undo the miserable mischief which is yet in your power."

But Mrs. Endon's malady was beyond the reach of help or hope. She declined rapidly. Every day she became more feeble; she spoke but little. She did not complain, but there was a manifest fix fixed upon her his icy grasp; he could not be far distant. Three weeks after I had communicated to her the contents of Delaine's letter she died. Her end was calm, and she breathed her last imploring the mercy of Heaven on her erring child.

I attended her funeral. Besides myself there were but few mourners. The impression was just turning in at the gate of the church-yard when the rattling of wheels was heard behind us, and I saw a gaudy carriage, with a fast trotter. The truth flashed across me in a moment. I trembled all over, but I said nothing. I might be mistaken.

I was not.

The match reached the church-yard gate; the gate was flung open, and a female figure, which we all knew in a moment, rushed up the pathway, and threw herself, with a piercing shriek, upon the coffin. We hastened to raise her up; she was senseless.

Alas! poor Fanny, she has never recovered these senses since!

A HUMAN SKULL.

A BRIAN skull! I bought it pasting cheap—
Of course 'twas dearer to its first employer;
I bought mortality dirt cheap that day.

Some mute memento of the Old Destroyer.

It is a ghostly monitor, and must
Confound our waxing and its summing;
It is a grave domestic finger-post
Of Life—an emblem of the shadows coming.

Time was some may here prized its flowing skin:
Upon his eyes were world-perspex in transport tender:
Some may have chucked what was a dimpled chin,
And what was forehead, kissed as gender!

Did she live yesterday, or ages back?
What color were the eyes whose bright and waking?
And were your ringlets fair, or brown, or black,
Poor little head! that long has done with aching?

It may have held the aloest some random shots)
Thy brain, Elgin Fry, or Baron Byron's,
The wits of Nolly Gwynn, or Doctor Watts,
Two quoted lords! two philanthropic sirens!

But this I surely know before I closed
The bargain on the morning that I bought it—
It was not half so bad as those it enclosed—
Nor quite as good as many may have thought it.

Who love, can smell no special type of Death;
He hired his awful face too soon, too often
"Immortelles" bloom in Beauty's bridal wreath;
And does not yon green elm contain a coffin?

Oh! ears mine, what hints of care are these?
The heart still lingers with the golden hours,
As autumn lost is on the chestnut-trees,
And where is all that boasted wealth of flowers?

If Life no more can yield us what it gave,
It still is better than the pale fee praises—
A very worthless ripple may dig the grave,
But hath—unless will dress the turf with daisies!

THE COMING CRISIS IN ENGLAND.

WE have had so much trouble at home since the election that but few of us have had time to think of the consequences of our present complications upon the commercial community of Great Britain. A glance at the state of affairs in England shows that, however great our own suffering may be, the English must suffer much more.

England is at present undergoing the natural consequences of a short harvest of cereals. She is taking a million dollars' worth of food from us per week—if her wheat had been as fruitful as usual, she would not have taken over a quarter of this amount. The difference must be paid for in specie. This is the salient, credits on London. She is, moreover, carrying on a war in China, which involves an expenditure of fully half a million dollars per week, the whole of which is paid in specie. Add to this that our imports from Great Britain this year have been considerably larger than those of last year, and that in all probability we shall take still less next spring, and it will be seen that the commercial position of England, before the recent turn in the exchanges, was quite critical. Now the exchanges have turned against Great Britain to such an extent that there is a profit of nearly two per cent. on the importation of gold from England. It is pretended, in certain quarters, that this turn in the exchanges arises from the mere speculation among importers—in other words, that it is an indication of our poverty. The event will prove, on the contrary, that it is a most convincing indication of our strength, and that the fall in sterling bills simply means, that, instead of owing several millions of dollars to England, we generally do, that country is in debt to us, and is increasing that debt every month did every week.

What the effect will be in England when we come to draw a million a week in bullion from them, we forbear to speculate. A requisition for $1,500,000 by the Bank of France obliged the Bank of England to advance the rate of interest from 4 to 5 per cent. At this rate our demands would justify an advance to 10 per cent. within a few days. But would this save the British commercial public?

We can not see that it would. Sight bills on London are offered by the agents of the Rothschilds at 106 per cent. This leaves a profit of considerably over one per cent. on the importation of gold from England—whatever the Bank rate of interest may be. The advance in the rate of interest would inconvenience British merchants, and would involve a serious loss on the value of merchandise and property; but we can not discover that it would interpose any serious obstacle to the export of gold to this side the Atlantic.

There is good reason to believe that we are witnessing one of the most remarkable transitions in history—the transfer of commercial sovereignty from London to New York.

A quarter of a century since, this country was always a debtor to the foreign world. In those days the United States Bank tried to bridge over the gulf between our exports of food and our exports of cotton by a system of "kiting." It answered for a few years, and then broke down. The catastrophe led to a general liquidation and a universal curtailment of expenses, which, for a few years, answered the desired end. In or about 1850 we began again to expand. Our production of gold and produce increased, and so did our expenditure. The latter, as usual in this country, finally outran the former, and the result was the crisis of 1857. Since then we have pursued a different plan. Our expenditures have been curtailed throughout the country; our production has increased. The result is that now, instead of owing money to Europe, we are creditors of the world at large. The trade statistics of the fiscal year 1860–'61 will show, if they are accurately made up, that we have exported very much more produce and gold than we have imported of foreign goods. The result is the decline in exchange which we have alluded to, which is the proper symptom of the transfer of commercial sovereignty from London to New York.

This change can not be effected without a severe ordeal on the other side the Atlantic. London has been for a century the true centre of the trade of the world. It is now going to sink into a secondary position, and New York is going to take its place. The change will involve a crisis in England such as that country has never known; though among us we have interests on the other side of the ocean must prepare for the emergency.

THE LOUNGER.

NOW AND THEN.

THE charter and career of the great Italian, Garibaldi, are constantly reminding us of the surprising changes that Time and Chance, who used to dedicate a fresh work to every new turn of history, or who seemed to him to be such—to Bolivar, General Jackson, and even Pope Pius, in the early days of his reign—has not been inspired to gather some late ripened fruit of his genius, and lay it at the feet of Garibaldi.

There was some talk of sending him some kind of tribute from this country. But what could be sent that would be so welcome to him as the consciousness of the national admiration and sympathy? How little Prince of Wales had received such a greeting as that multitude which thronged the city, a ball of some persons at the Academy; one measure admitted and succeeful, we believe, and smell in its impression. So after the grandeur of Garibaldi's welcome which Garibaldi knows to be universal among us, any thing less than an official national tribute would be altogether meagre and ludicrous.

After freeing his country he puts the crown, with his country's consent, upon the head of Victor Emanuel, and retires. Throughout his conduct has been mostly and simple. There was at one moment a brilliant chance that he might not agree with Cavour. Danger full of menace for Italian liberty. But in nothing has Garibaldi shown himself so consistent, so real, so more plainly than in his yielding his own plan. He was brave enough to reconsider his own intention, and wise enough to recede from his words. He said, early in the summer, that he should proclaim the kingdom of Italy from Rome, and that, until then, Sicily and Naples must have a provisional government. But when Cavour said and showed that this plan was disastrous, and help to defeat the very purpose they both contemplated, Garibaldi heroically yielded, and the work was finished by him, yet not exactly as he had intended.

If it could not be done with the brain of Cavour, the heart of Garibaldi, and the hand of Victor Emanuel, when and how could it have been hoped for? If it can not be united and organized by the same combination, is there any reasonable hope for Italy?

The spectacle of the hero sheathing his sword and bowing his head before the king he has crowned with a people's choice has but one parallel in history. And when the tranquil greatness, maintained with private ambition, the world has not often seen in all its story, and in all the centuries to write my eye rests upon a picture of Napoleon Bonaparte, sitting in silk and velvet and satin, spangled and embroidered, like a Roman senator made a God. How infinitely poor the spectacle! How paltry the ambition and reward! Think of Napoleon bowing his head at Saint Helena! Garibaldi at his country home!

And recall the words that were spoken when this nation was born:

"Happy in the confirmation of our independence and peace, we feel the strongest obligations to accepted with diffidence; which, however, was superseded by a confidence in the rectitude of our cause, the support of the supreme power of the nation, and the patronage of Heaven. I close the list act of my official life by commending the interests of our dearest country to the protection of Almighty God, and those who have the superintendence of them to His holy keeping. Having finished the work assigned me, I retire from the great theatre of action, and bidding an affectionate farewell to this august body, under whose orders I have so long acted, I here offer my commission, and take my leave of the employments of my public life."

Listen to the reply:

"Sir, have you decided the standard of liberty in the New World; having taught a lesson useful to those who inflict and those who feel oppression, you retire with the blessings of your fellow-citizens, though the glory of your virtues will not terminate with your military command, but will descend to remotest ages."

Is it Garibaldi who speaks, and Italy that replies? No, it is Washington and America. And yet the same pure purpose, the same high honor, the same simple love of liberty and devotion to duty are there, and they are both the heroes? Shall we not stretch out our hands and hearts to

Italy, and say to her, "Sister, we have each been defrauded to the same great purpose; let us work together to achieve it!"

MR. JOHN JOHNS.

IT was a wild, snowy day, such as would have done honor to mid-January in Canada, when Mr. John Johns might have been seen entering a railroad car with a hat, traveling-bag, and umbrella. It was at a way station, and the train had been delayed, for the sleet had coated the rails so smoothly that the wheels would occasionally merely revolve upon their axle-trees, and the train stand still at a tremendous rate. Then it would rally slowly, move along gradually, take hold of the track, and finally roll along with that heavy monotonous air soothing to the passenger who wishes to read.

This particular passenger, Mr. John Johns, had several old papers and periodicals, which he had been reserving for some such moment as this. The long leisure of railroad travel, with nobody to talk to you or to make you afraid of having to show useful it is to bring up the arrears of reading! Mr. John Johns opened some numbers of the London Saturday Review—a periodical which thinks nothing less than the choicest Champagne of itself—and read that Mr. Thackeray was no gentleman; then turning back as far away as last April, discovered that prize-fighters were the finest specimens of manhood and Christianity extant.

Times were exhilarating things to read on a wild winter day, slipping comfortably along in a car with very few passengers and plenty of room. The frost quite covered the windows, so that Mr. John Johns, looking out through the snow-crust, and after reading he meditated for some time, until the cars stopped at a station. Then, lifting his window, he observed a great rush of boys and men along the platform, and a suppressed cry, "There he is! in front car!" and the crowd swept by in the wild blowing snow, while several of the fellow-passengers started to their feet and pressed forward to gaze at some personage in the neighboring car.

Mr. John Johns was perplexed.

"It can't be D. Wales," he said to himself, "for he is at home long ago. It can't be any new or old President, for they are also quietly at home. It can't be any distinguished Senator, for they, too, are at home after the election. Who can it be?"

The passengers, and the train pitching onward, Mr. John Johns opened his papers and read placidly on. Yet he could not help hearing a murmur about him—"I saw him! No, did you? How does he look? Well, Matilda, would you like to see him? Certainly; why not? WHY, Matilda-da-da!"

Mr. John Johns could not but admire the heroism of Matilda; but he was sorely curious to know what illustrious personage the train contained. "Time will show" he said. "I shall not ask. Who on earth is it in that Matilda would not be wish to see?" Mr. John Johns thrilled as a thought transfixed him. "Of course," he said to himself, with the satisfaction of triumph, "Kingsbury, and of course."

He returned to his reading of the Saturday Review's exhortation, that all men should become eyes, as Tom Sayers is. The cars stopped again. There was the same rush and excitement. He put his head out of the window, but could see nothing. "'Tis very extraordinary!" quoth Mr. John Johns, and he would have spoken Matilda as she passed forward, despite the deprecatory warnings of her sister, to see the object of desire.

At length the train stopped again. "Twen-n-ty minutes for dinner!" shouted a cheerful voice, and the crowd of passengers rose simultaneously, and moved to the door of the car. They stepped down in the whirled of snow upon the platform. Mr. John Johns stared vainly eagerly as he entered the station-room, to knock the snow off his boots. Looking up, saw a large crowd gathered about the dining-room door, which was not yet open. But the door flew open immediately, and a few of the passengers only, the rest of the crowd, passed in to dinner; the bulk of the throng remained staring and gaping at the party which had entered, a group of six or eight persons.

"I am bound to investigate it," said Mr. John Johns to himself, and he seated himself at table opposite the party. The hero of the group was evidently the one whom Matilda had been willing and anxious to see. It was a hero whose depth from breast to back was remarkable: his torso was splendid. He was dressed very simply, and was shaved, except upon the upper lip, which was hidden by a heavy dark moustache. The hero's nose was broken as to the bone, and ran two spurs aside as to the skin. The right eye was black and swollen, and the left eye sadly bumped or bruised or "lumped." The gaping crowd surrounded the end of the room, and surveyed him as he ate, as the royal Bengal tiger is contemplated at feeding time. Part of the guests he rose from, and accompanied by his retinue, whose noses had a singular analogy of appearance, and, walking very erect and without any swagger, he passed out of the hall, the expectant and admiring crowd opening before him as he advanced.

"I hope," said the sympathetic Mr. John Johns, "I hope that Matilda is in a favorable place for seeing." Mr. John Johns just half hurried the guests into the train, and away they went again, while Mr. John Johns resumed his reading of the character of the Christian athlete, as expounded by the London Saturday Review. Late at night, long after the dun hour—for they had been so sadly delayed by the snow-storm—the train rolled into a certain city. Mr. John Johns betook himself to his favorite hotel. He supped, and he lighted his cigar. "Now I wonder," he said, "who it is that I have seen to-day."

He raised his eyes as if to interrogate the fates, and beheld, upon a poster printed in black and blue ink, National Welcome to John C. Heenan.

"'Twas the Benicia Boy," quoth Mr. John Johns, as he took his candle; and so ended a day's sight-seeing in that city.

THE NEW STORY.

THE new novel of Dickens's, "Great Expectations," which was begun in the Weekly two weeks ago, opens with all the familiar raciness and power. In a sharp characterization, not only of human beings but of landscape and scenery, Dickens is without a rival. The very houses and fields have a sympathy with the story which they are depicted. In "Little Dorrit," for instance, how curiously interested you become in the old house with the mysterious holes in the wall, and in the spell which it casts and holds over Arthur Clennam! Flintwinch is a wonderful fascination about the old place which the stern Mrs. Clennam and Flintwinch himself and the Mephistopholean Affery can not overcome. In the present story he has conveyed that, if you remember the picture of the last scene in the history of the house, in which Mephisto did the smoking in Faust with infernal, he can not escape the weird look of consciousness in the old pile—a dark, shadowy, inscrutable consciousness, as if it knew the part it was to play in the drama, and was aware of the significance and importance of its agency.

When "Little Dorrit" was published as a whole, its Blackwood, I think) assisted it as a hodge-podge, as written at different times, to plot out purposes, and, in proof, cited the very incident of the falling house, a mere make-shift, as the critic declared, to dispose of the story, and to be accomplished by the recent fall of a house in London.

Dickens replied to this in the Household Words to this critic. It is happy for all his readers that he did so, because he entirely demolished the reviewer's position. The falling of the mansion was as great as his power of conception and narrative. He remained the reader that, in the very first page, he published a story told two years before the last, and of course the same time before the fall of the London house, he had described the singular, inexplicable wear of the house. He did not tell us what they were. They were unexplained and unexplainable, and the obvious apprehension of Mistress Affery, to whom they were supernatural sounds. And all through the book these sounds occur at the most startling and pointing directly, though the reader could not know it yet, to the catastrophe; themselves accomplishing the catastrophe. Dickens has never explained the mystery which had accompanied us from the first page. It was a most magnificent stroke of literary art, and it is no wonder that Dickens rushed to the rescue to avenge his own skill and common sense.

In the opening of "Great Expectations" the landscape is drawn into sympathy with the story, and in the same way. The dreary marshes, with the creaking chains upon the gibbet, the starving cattle scattered from the hulks, the prison ships in which lie buried Pip's parents, the hard life of Pip and his brother-in-law, and the great sad sea closing around us from the hulks, the prisoners these all combine in feeling and impression; men and landscape merge and mingle, and you lie, as you read, in the grip of a nightmare.

How affluent, how sweet and genial that genius which, from its happy consciousness to its man, as he seats himself daily to tell his story, that thousands and thousands are eagerly waiting to follow where he leads! Let a London house fall without fire in him not to fail to begin this new story now. If you wait until it is completed you will hardly read it all. A few more chapters will display a great attention. When authors are taught by circumstances that it is better for them to write serially, readers may be very sure that it is wiser for them to read serially.

A PLEA FOR MERCY.

CAN nothing be done? Is it not enough that people must leave their homes in the fiercest winter weather, that they must be driven to be emphasized by that of the body? "Power are, several years ago, the Duke of Alençon died on a grisly November evening. It was just dusk, and the rigor-mortis chilly, and the dim light rendered more dreary by a few spectral lights. The hapless stranger knew what awaited him, and lingered and lingered upon the threshold, before upon the outwindow, which were covered with vapor, and saw that not a solitary crack held out hope of oxygen to him. Suddenly the bell sang along the passage-ly, and the reluctant traveler lifted his feet slowly upon the stairs and entered the room. The box was solid with men in heavy woolen coats, saturated with the moisture. There were two stoves heated to the dim degree. The atmosphere was somewhat thick with the fumes of the wet garments and the exhausted air; and there was a universal aspect of profound depression on the faces and forms of the passengers.

It was at once clear to the traveler that it would be very difficult to obtain a sufficient consent of the neighborhood to open a window. The sad victims were in fact shut up in the box, and there was no forts of any companion to escape. But when our friend seated himself he turned to the man behind, who was absorbed in interesting a book, and even asked him if he objected to having the window raised.

"Not at all; I likes the fresh air, but I don't like to make trouble."

They were two admirable propositions, and were not disputed by the traveler, who opened his window, and felt the electric thrill of the sweet cold air shoot through his frame. Immediately his neighbor in front, cheered by the cordial that poured unconsciously into his lungs, raised his window, and said that his head ached from the abominable foulness of the atmosphere. But this bold beginning was all. Nobody else had mercy upon himself or his neighbors. The rest sat grimly breathing poison, and shrugging their shoulders and looking revengefully virtuous toward the windows that had got high. Still the sweet cold air flowed in; the traveler rejoiced that reason, even if unwillingly, was at last allowed to have her way. But while he rejoiced, a fellow-traveler, who had been covering over the hot iron stove, sallow, cadaverous, and sick, humbly begged that the window might be closed, it was so very raw and cold.

"But then you are so far away," pleaded the traveler.

"I know, but it makes the air so cold."

"Not when you are used to it. I can not blow on you."

"Yes, yes, but then it looks so dreadfully cold; and I know it is so even if I don't feel it."

The sallow man was not to be satisfied with a compromise. The traveler partly closed the window and stoutly clung to the crack sucking the sweet air through.

Now in all that box or car there was an means of ventilation whatsoever but two small registers, like holes at the end on each side of the door. There were at least sixty people shut up in the place, since then could find seats, and a man introduced some vitality into the atmosphere and tried to neutralize the poison at his peril. Now don't let us submit to this suffocation any longer. If a man or woman is ill and can not endure the air, then exercise prerogative, but they can not change your seat. But when great hulking men and hearty women insist upon sitting in the suffocating medium, insist that you shall breathe, that they may just as much bound to yield to you and fresh air as you are to surrender to them and carbonic acid gas. Try it to the end, and see the contempt if the Persists. In default of the conductor take the sense of the people in the car. Among the inalienable rights of man is that of fresh air. Don't suffer yourself to be deprived of it without a struggle. Hold if you can the window. If the passengers rise against you, but yield under protest. Cry to the last "power are, sextant, range are!" So shall your children and your children's wealth sound lungs, shunning your name, and your refreshed and renewed fellow-men devoted to their rights of oxygen, thank you and praise you by name.

Let the travelers do that. As for the Lounger in the echoing car, he will do something if he does not practice what he preaches, and if you see him complacently breathing all the poisonous air in all the cars in the country.

A BUFFALO STUDIO.

LOUNGING into Buffalo, Mr. Eadie I stepped into the studio of Mr. Beard. His pictures were gathered for a sale, previous to his departure for what he considered the better New York of the metropolis. You did not exactly expect to find a studio in Buffalo—the pleasant, broad-streeted city upon the Niagara, with its handsome houses—and coming as case, with plenty of elbow-room, as it were, in open grounds, and the lake winds blowing through the town and whisking away the seeds of disease. You anticipated great granaries, and hundreds of canal boats, and innumerable wriggling serpents known as railroad trains, and a universal whistling of steam and roar of traffic and busy crowds. But pictures and Buffalo are words that do not immediately mingle in your imagination.

Stepping out of an open space upon which stands one of the very finest Roman churches, in a moment we were standing in Beard's studio. He is peculiarly a painter of dogs, and of their sagacious race is Landseer is—not of their simple animal nature as Rosa Bonheur is, but of the humor that the human imagination has readily find in them. The huge mowy owl, perched upon a mountain height at midnight, gazing with wise, ludicrously wise eyes, at the moon, is Beard's or presents' an astronomer. And upon this canvas is a carnival of bears. A band of the Buffalo's zouave family upon a picnic, in a wood, with piles of luscious fruit to which they riot, which they eat sitting upon their hind legs, with their paws and surfeits them, so that they lie drunk and weary upon the ground—fancy, in fact, leave upon a bender, and you have Beard's picture. Another is by that name.

It is a new vein delicately worked; but it is not all that the artist can do. He has a number of dogs upon the prairie are spirited and good. There is a Puss in Boots, a Red Riding Hood with the expectant wolf. For some reason the painter does not stay in Buffalo. He is drawn to the great centres whither the artists all tend. Even there, then, tests seem to have been reform upon the outskirts of our civilization. Think of the sale of Mr. Leupp's gallery of pictures the day! At what prices the pictures went! No, we are not quite ripe for the pictures. Patience, patience! the great Italian pictures are not yet five hundred years old; and how old is Italy?

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE TWO KINGS AT TEANO.

On room 25, 1860.

VICTOR and GARIBALDI, side by side—

Happy brothers—of the sword and crosses—hand in hand,
Smith the blue sky of their regenerate land,
Side, side, side—the sun shines on them, they ride!
Not many royal hands so pure of guilt,
Not by half so much of honest blood to spill,
Many with grasp of the familiar hilt
Of Glory's sword, have clasped it since the day
Of those deep-seated and unswerving eyes,
Fearful or terrible, as with the skies
Sublime or fallen in them. Ride on, ride on!
Of "Long live Italy, Castile, now and for,
All good men's hopes left to their investiture,
Longest benedictions, and shortest curses!
Ride on, ride on, and still ride on!
In spite of friends that on the ivy cling,
Holding with wintry grasp, and direct like spring.
Ride on, Victor Emanuel, to the throne
Which your valor and wisdom have both toppled down.
While Garibaldi, guerdonless, alone,
Takes him to his home, and nobler crown!

WHEN is a man out of date?—When he's a weak back.

THE BRITISH AND THE BLACK PRINCE.—We have the best authority for stating that FRANCIS II., the ex-king of Naples, has declined, with thanks, the asylum which has been offered him by the Queen of Spain and the Emperor of Austria. The dethroned monarch will reside at the home that he publicly would even in the Imperial Palace at VIENNA. His loyalty has decided on accepting the hospitality of the King of Dahomey.

A FEW FOR DOOR CRACKERS.—The partisans of the Pope and the Austrian system of Italy call Garibaldi a Filibuster. As that hero is fighting for the freedom of Italy, we should like to say that we will count themselves with calling him a Freebooter?

THE STRONGEST ARGUMENT AGAINST CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.—Decapitation is no longer.

MINERALOGICAL DISCOVERY BY AN INVENTOR.—How to turn brass into gold—"Marry an heiress."

HOPPINGS and scores are the measures of our mortal life; we willingly submit to the measure of gladness, and sorrow's knots make their own inquires.

NATIVE-minded men, who have not a thought beyond the little plans of their own circle, would find the following inscription: "You shall see nothing but its own shell, and thinks it to be grounded in the universe."

AT every instant during life a portion of our substance becomes dead, combines with some of the inhaled oxygen, and is removed. In this process it is supposed that the whole body is renewed every seven years.

IT is a little thing to speak a phrase of common comfort, which, to the utterer, may cost but his breath; yet, on the one hand to whom thought to die unmourned, 'will fall like sweetest balm.

LOVE one human being purely and warmly, and you will love all. The heart, in this heaven, like the wandering Israelites, finds manna, fresh from dew-drop to the cream, but a mirror which it worries and fills.

IT seems a cruel misfortune that body and mind, like friends in a boat, should always agree in distress. It is bad when the mind survives the body: worse still when the body survives the mind; and worst of all when both survive together.

One of the missionaries in Burmah, speaking of the cholera, says: "The treatment of this disease is very simple—a little calomelation. An incision is made on the breast or back of the patient, and an extract of a certain species of lemon fails of effecting a cure."

SOMEBODY says, very truly, that a person who shortchanges to raise himself by scandalizing others, might just as well climb on a wheel-barrow and undertake to wheel himself.

"Will you marry me, Miss?" "Sir, you know very well what I will say when I would never marry." "Oh yes! if I hadn't known it, I shouldn't have asked you."

"POOR boy!" pityingly said a kind-hearted old lady in Quebec, when the prison stood barricaded under a battering ram to receive some complimentary address. "Poor boy! why don't he get out and keep the rain off?"

WOMAN'S VANITY.

Though she is old she thinks she's young,
And yet there's no insanity;
What can it be besides her time?
Pshaw! only woman's vanity.

She wears great bustles on her extra bone,
Oh, weakness of humanity!
And then she tips her arm very,
Which shows a woman's vanity.

What's more, she thinks she's quite "a Rose,"
Although there's much insanity;
How can she think herself a wit?
Go ask a woman's vanity.

But ladies, though her fault we see,
Let's treat her with urbanity;
For more or less we all have got
A touch of woman's vanity.

"OH, ma," said Miss M'Gregor, rushing in to her ma, "ma, what a very twelve-dozen creature our washerwoman is!"

"Indeed, is she! And what's that, my dear?" quoth the wondering mamma.

"Why, don't you know that twelve dozen is a gross," replied the astonished miss, "and gross is very coarse."

"Yes, of course. What a lovely thing education is, my child!"

MR. E——, a barrister, noted for absence of mind, was once witnessing the representation of "Macbeth;" and on Banquo's ghost stepping in the Thane's chair, and they were "doing a deed without a name," catching the sound of the words, he started up, exclaiming, to the astonishment of the audience, "A deed without a name! Why, it's void; and his words are true."

TWO Frenchmen—one wealthy and in possession of ready cash, and the other poor and penniless—accosted, by chance, a Jew in the streets of Amsterdam hotel. In the morning the ready one arose first, took from his pocket a pistol, and holding it to the forehead, shot himself. The stranger then exclaimed to his terrified companion, "It is my hot dog, and I will have it!" So saying he took out of his pocket five five hundred francs, or I will instantly blow out my brains. The Jew, in order to save the life of his friend, like Regulus, or found himself the hero of an unpleasant dilemma; but he was not to be outdone in generous-ness by a stranger. Said he quietly crept to his pantaloons, and handed over the money, and the stranger immediately blew open the door to the outside.

THERE is the easy likely to run out of the room for some. When there is a lack in it.

"I'll let you know when I come again," was the threatening said to the unwelcome guest.

AN attorney having died in poor circumstances, one of his friends observed that he had left but few effects. "That is not much to be wondered at," said another, "for he had but few causes."

"I will and buzzards," said Pat, "to my beloved wife Bridget all my property. Without reserve," and when Patrick one-half of the remainder, and to Dennis, my younger son, I leave the rest, hoping it left to George to Terence O'Cuty, in sweet Ireland."

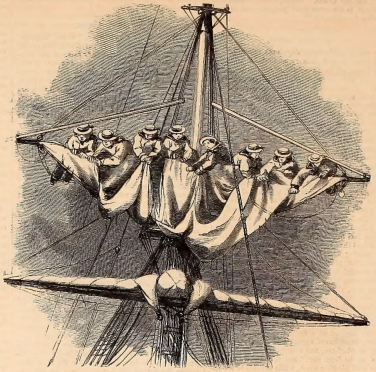
"AH!" said a Sunday-school teacher: "ah, Caroline Jones, what do you think you would have been without your good father and good mother?"

"Orphans," said Caroline, who was very much struck with the odd appeal. "I suppose, mam, so I should be born without parents."

THE Duchess of Kingston was remarkable for having a high notion of her own dignity. Before she attended a her carriage by the unfolding of a coat of coals in a very grande style, she treated herself with her usual pride to her door, and said to the man,

"How dare you, sirrah, stop a woman of quality in the street?"

"Woman of quality!" replied the man.

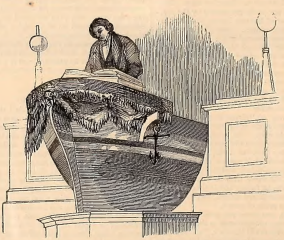


"Yes, fellow," rejoined her Grace. "Don't you see my arms on my carriage?"

"Yes," replied he, "I do; and a pair of coarse arms they are."

IT is mentioned as a curious circumstance that a watch should be perfectly dry when it has a running spring in it.

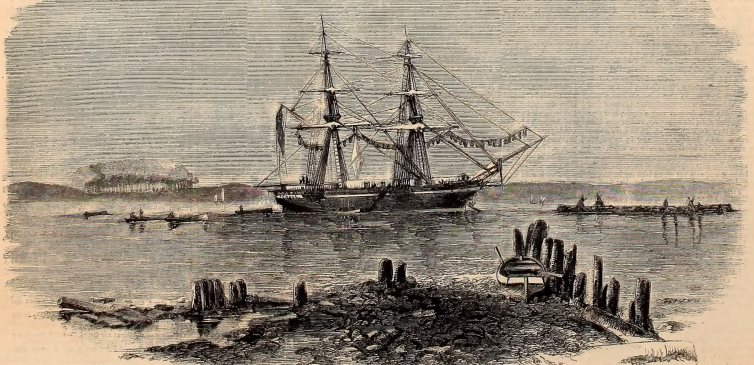
PUPILS AT THEIR STUDIES—ON BOARD THE "LODEBAR."



EXERCISES ALOFT—FURLING SAIL.

THE MARINE SCHOOL AT CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.

THE accompanying engravings will introduce our readers to one of the most interesting institutions of Charleston, South Carolina, and one which at the present time deserves general attention. We refer to the Marine School.



The originator of the school was Rev. W. B. Yates, Chaplain to the Charleston Port Society. Many years ago this gentleman reported to the Society that Charleston ought to establish a training-ship for sailors. After long deliberation the Board decided to act upon the suggestion, and accordingly a Board of Trustees was named in March, 1859. On 23d May of the same year the brig Lodebar was bought by the Trustees, towed from the wharf, and anchored in Cooper River. Her commander was Captain M. L. Aimar, who, with a teacher, boatswain, sailor, and sixteen pupils, constituted the crew of the new school. Since then the boatswain and the sailor have been superseded by a mate, Mr. T. L. A. Brown, and the number of pupils has been largely increased. Twenty-five young men have entered into indentures to serve as apprentices on board the school-ship for three years. The experiment, in fact, has proved a complete success, and it is expected that the boys will shortly be far enough advanced to enable them to take the brig to sea.

The rules and regulations of the Marine School are extremely stringent. At 5.30 A.M. in summer, and 6 A.M. in winter, all hands are called, and the boys dress and lash away their hammocks. Two days in each week they are called half an hour earlier, in order to give them time to wash their clothes. At 7 in summer, and 7.30 in winter, the deck is washed and the ship cleaned. This operation is succeeded, at 8, by breakfast. At 9 school begins; on Tuesdays and Thursdays the pupils learn navigation from the captain and mate; on the other days of the week they study the ordinary elements of an English education. One of our engravings shows the boys at work in their school-room. At 12.30 P.M. school is dismissed. At 1 the dinner commences. The afternoon is devoted to nautical evolutions and physical exercise. Supper takes place at 6 in winter and 7 in summer. After supper the boys read till 9, when all must turn in. Pupils are allowed to visit the city once a fortnight—on Saturday. No pupil is allowed to use tobacco or spirituous liquors, or to utter profane language. On Sundays the pupils are bound to attend the Mariner's Church, at which Mr. Yates officiates. One of our engravings gives a picture of that gentleman in his Bethel pulpit. This school is one of the most deserving in the country.

PULPIT IN THE MARINER'S CHURCH, CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.

We notice that Governor Gist, in his Message just sent in to the Legislature, lays stress upon the importance of the Marine School at Charleston, and points out the value which it will possess should the State embark in a career of independent national existence. There is no port in the country which would not be greatly benefited by the establishment of similar nurseries for seamen, under proper management, and governed by men of judgment and experience.

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

"AY!" returned the sergeant, "two. They're pretty well known to be out on the marshes still, and they won't try to get clear of 'em before dusk. Any body here seen any thing of any such game?"

Every body, myself excepted, said no, with confidence. Nobody thought of me.

"Well!" said the sergeant, "they'll find themselves trapped in a circle, I expect, sooner than they count on. Now, blacksmith! If you're ready, the King is."

Joe had got his coat and waistcoat and cravat off, and his leather apron on, and passed into the forge. One of the soldiers opened its wooden windows, another lighted the fire, another turned to at the bellows, the first rested round the blaze, which was soon roaring. Then Joe began to hammer and clink, hammer and clink, and all looked on.

The interest of the impending pursuit not only absorbed the general attention here of the time, but my sister generous. She drew a pitcher of beer from the cask for the soldiers, and invited the sergeant to take a glass of brandy. But Mr. Pumblechook said, sharply, "Give him wine, mum. I'll engage there's no Tar in that;" so the sergeant thanked him and said that, as he preferred his drink without tar, he would take wine, if it was equally convenient. When it was given him he drank his Majesty's health and Compliments of the Season, and took it all at a mouthful and smacked his lips.

"Good stuff, sh, sergeant?" said Mr. Pumblechook.

"I'll tell you something," returned the sergeant; "I suspect that stuff's of your providing."

Mr. Pumblechook, with a fat sort of laugh, said, "I'ay, ay? Why?"

"Because," returned the sergeant, clapping him on the shoulder, "you're a man that knows what's what."

"D'ye think so?" said Mr. Pumblechook, with his former laugh. "Have another glass."

"With you. Hob and nob," returned the sergeant. "The top of mine to the foot of yours, the foot of yours to the top of mine. Ring once, ring twice, the best tune on the Musical Glasses! Your health. May you live a thousand years, and never be a worse judge of the right sort than at the present moment of your life!"

The sergeant tossed off his glass again and seemed quite ready for more. I noticed that Mr. Pumblechook in his hospitality appeared to forget that he had made a present of the wine, but took the bottle from Mrs. Joe and had all the credit of handing it about, which was coolly civil. Even I got some. And he was so very free of the wine that he even called for the other bottle, and handed that round as a treat, which was crafty when the first was gone.

As I remember the proceedings, they all stood clustered about the forge enjoying themselves so much, I thought what terrible good sauce for a dinner my fugitive was providing for them. They had not enjoyed themselves a quarter so much before the entertainment was brightened with the excitement of chasing me. They fell to, when they were all in lively expectation of those two villains being taken, and when the bellows seemed to rose for them, the fire to flare for them, the smoke to hurry out in pursuit of them, Joe to hammer them, and the locksmith and all the murky shadows on the wall to stare at them in menace as the blaze rose and sank, and the red-hot spirits dropped from the iron. Nothing afterwards outside almost seemed, in my pitying young fancy, to have turned pale on their account, poor wretches!

At last, Joe's job was done, and the ringing and roaring stopped. Then Joe put on his coat, he mustered courage to propose that some of us should go down with the soldiers and see what came of the hunt. Mr. Pumblechook said that Hubble declined, on the plea of a pipe and ladies' society; but Mr. Wopsle said he would go if Joe would. Joe said he was agreeable, and he would take me, if Mrs. Joe approved. We never should have got leave to go, I am sure, but for Mrs. Joe's curiosity to know all about it and how it ended. As it was, she merely stipulated, "if you bring the boy back with his head blown off by a musket, don't say it was my doing."

The sergeant took a polite leave of the ladies, and parted from Mr. Pumblechook as from a comrade; though Mr. Pumblechook, quite as fully sensible of that gentleman's merits under arid conditions as when something to drink was going, His men resumed their muskets and fell in. Mr. Wopsle, Joe, and I, received strict charge to keep in the rear, and to speak no word after we reached the marshes. When we were all out in the raw air and steadily moving toward our business, I tenderly reminded Joe that, "I hope, Joe, we shan't be shot?" and Joe whispered to me, "I'd give a shilling if they had cut and run, free."

We were joined by no stragglers from our village, for the weather was cold and threatening, the way dreary, the footing bad, dusk coming on, and the people had good fires in-doors and were keeping the day. A few faces hurried to glowing windows and looked after us, but none came out. We passed the finger-post, and held straight on to the churchyard. There we were stopped a few minutes by a signal from the sergeant's hand, while two or three of his men disappeared among the graves, and examined the porch. They came in again without finding any thing, and then we struck out on the open marshes, through the gate at the side of the church-yard. A bitter sleet came driving against us on the east wind, and Joe took me on his back.

Now that we were out upon the dismal wilderness, where they little thought I had been within eight or nine hours and had seen both men hiding, I considered, for the first time, with great dread, if we should some upon them, would my particular convict suppose that it was I who had brought the soldiers there? He had asked me if I was a deceiving imp, and he had said I should be a fierce young hound if I joined the hunt against him. Would he believe that I was both imp and hound in treacherous earnest, and had betrayed him?

It was of no use asking myself this question now. There I was, on Joe's back, and there was Joe beneath me, charging out the ditches in the misty moonlight, and stimulating Mr. Wopsle not to tumble on his Roman nose, and to keep up with us. The soldiers were in front of us, extended into a pretty wide line with an interval between man and man. We were taking the exact course I had begun with, and from which I had diverged in the mist. Either the mist was not out again yet, or the wind had moved it. Under the low red glare of sunset the beacon, and the gibbet, and the mound of the Battery, and the opposite shore of the river, were plain enough, though all of a watery lead color.

With my heart thumping like a small blacksmith at Joe's bound shoulder, I looked all around for any sign of the convicts. I could see none, I could hear none. Mr. Wopsle had greatly alarmed me more than once by his blowing and hard breathing; but I knew the sounds by this time, and could dissociate them from the object of pursuit. I got a dreadful start, and thought I heard the file still going; but it was only a sheep-bell. The sheep stopped in their eating and looked timidly at us; and the cattle, their heads turned from the wind and sleet, stared vacantly, as if they held us responsible for both these annoyances: but, except these things, and the shudder of the whole dying day, there was no break in the uniform stillness of the marshes.

The soldiers were moving on in the direction of the old Battery, and we were moving on a little way behind them, when, all of a sudden, we all stopped. For there had reached us, on the wings of the wind and rain, a long shout. It was repeated. It was at a distance toward the east, but it was long and loud. Nay, there seemed to be two shouts raised together—if one might judge from a confusion in the sound.

To this effect the sergeant and the nearest men were speaking under their breath when Joe and I came up. After another moment's listening, Joe (who was a good judge) agreed, and Mr. Wopsle (who was a bad judge) also agreed. The sergeant, a quick, decisive man, ordered that the sound should not be answered, but that the course should be changed, and that his men should make toward it "at the double." So we plunged to the right (where the East was), and Joe pounded away so wonderfully that I had to hold on tight to keep my seat.

It was a run indeed now, and what Joe called, in the only two words he spoke all the time, "a buster." Down banks and up banks, and over gates, and splashing into dikes: no man cared where he went. As we came nearer to the shouting, it became more and more apparent that it was made by more than one voice. Sometimes it seemed to stop altogether, and then the soldiers stopped. When it broke out again the soldiers made for it at a greater rate than ever, and we after them. After a while we had so run it down that we could hear one voice calling "Murder!" and another voice, "Convicts! Runaways! Guard! guard! This way for the runaway convicts!" Then both voices would seem to be stifled in a struggle, and then would break out again. And when it had come to this the soldiers ran like deer, and Joe too.

The sergeant ran in first, when we had run the noise quite down, and two of his men ran in close upon him. Their pieces were cocked and leveled when we all ran in.

"HERE ARE LOTS MORE!" panted the sergeant, struggling with something at the bottom of a ditch. "Surrender, you two! and confound you for two wild beasts! Come asunder!"

Water was splashing, and mud was splashing, and oaths were being sworn, and blows were being struck, when half a dozen more men went down into the ditch to help the sergeant, and dragged out, separately, my convict and the other one. Both were bleeding and panting and struggling and struggling; but of course I knew them both directly.

"Mind!" said my convict, wiping blood from his face, with his ragged sleeves, and shaking torn hair from his fingers: "I took him! I took him single hand. Mind that!"

"It's not much to be particular about," said the sergeant, coolly: "it'll do you small good, my man, being in the same plight yourself. Handcuffs there!"

"I don't expect it to do me any good. I don't want it to do me more good than it does now," said my convict, with a terrible laugh. "I took him. He knows it. That's enough for me."

The other convict was livid to look at, and, in addition to the old wrench on the left side of his face, seemed to be bruised and torn all over. He could not so much as get his breath to speak, until they were both separately handcuffed, but leaned upon a soldier to keep himself from falling.

"Take notice, guard, that he tried to murder me," were his first words.

"Tried to murder him?" said my convict, disdainfully. "Try, and not do it? I took him, and giv' him up; that's what I done. I not only prevented him getting off the marshes, but I dragged him here—dragged him this far on his way back. He's a gentleman, if you please, that villain. Now the Hulks has got its gentleman again, through me. Murder him? Worth my while, too, to murder him, when I could do worse and drag him back!"

The other one still gasped, "He tried—he tried—to murder me. Bear—bear witness."

"Lookee here!" said my convict to the sergeant, "I got clear of the prison-ship; I made a dash, and I done it. I could ha' got clear of these death-cold flats likewise—look at my leg: you won't find much iron on it—if I hadn't made discovery that he was there. Him give me free? Let him profit by the means as I found out? Let him make use of me afresh and again? Once more? No, no, no. If I had died at the bottom there"—and he made an emphatic motion at the ditch with his manacled hands—"I'd have held to him with that grip that you should have been safe to find him in my hold."

The other fugitive, who was evidently in extreme fear of his companion, repeated: "He tried to murder me. I should have been a dead man if you had not come up."

"He lies!" said my convict, with fierce energy. "He always lies. He's a liar born, and he'll die a liar. Look at his face; ain't it written there? Let him turn them eyes of his on me. I defy him to do it."

The other, with an effort at a scornful smile —which could not, however, collect the nervous working of his mouth into any set expression—looked at the soldiers, and looked about at the marshes and at the sky, but certainly did not look at the speaker.

"Do you see him?" pursued my convict. "Do you see what a villain he is? Do you see them growling and wandering eyes? That's how he looked when we were tried together. He never looked at me."

The other, always working and working his dry lips and turning his eyes restlessly about him

"THEN JOE BEGAN TO HAMMER AND CLINK, HAMMER AND CLINK."

far and near, did at last turn them for a moment on the speaker, with the words, "You are not much to look at," and with a half-taunting glance at the bound hands. At that point my convict became so frantically exasperated that he would have rushed upon him but for the interposition of the soldiers. "Didn't I tell you," said the other convict then, "that he would murder me if he could?" And any one could see that he should, and that there broke out upon his lips curious white flakes, like thin snow.

"Enough of this parley," said the sergeant. "Light those torches."

As one of the soldiers, who carried a basket in lieu of a gun, went down on his knee to open it my convict looked round him for the first time and moaned. I had slightly drawn Joe's back on the brink of the ditch when we came up, and had not moved since, and moved my hands and shook my head. I had been waiting for him to see me, that I might try to assure him of my innocence. It was not at all expressed to me that he even comprehended my intention, for he gave me a look that I did not understand, and it all passed in a moment. But if he had looked at me for an hour or a day, I could not have remembered his face ever afterward as having been more attentive.

The soldier with the basket soon got a light, and lighted three or four torches, and took one himself and distributed the others. It had been almost dark before, but now it seemed quite dark, and soon afterward very dark. Before we departed from that spot four of the soldiers, standing in a ring, fired twice into the air. Immediately we saw other torches lighted at some distance behind us, and others on the mountain side to the right and left of the river. "All right," said the sergeant. "March!"

We had not gone far when three cannon were fired ahead of us with a sound that seemed to burst something inside my ear. "You are expected up there," said the sergeant to the convict; "they know you are coming. Don't struggle, my man. Close up here."

The two were at that spot, and each walked surrounded by a separate guard. I had hold of Joe's hand now, and Joe carried one of the torches. Mr. Wopsle had been for going back, but Joe was resolved to see it out, so we went on with the party. There was a wooden bridge, a path now, mostly on the edge of the river, with a divergence here and there where a dike came, with a stunted shed or two, and a landing-place. When I looked round I could see the other lights coming on after us. The torches as we carried dropped great blotches of fire upon the track, and I could see these, too, smoke and gutter out. I could see nothing else but black darkness. Our lights warmed the air about us with their pitchy blaze, and the two wretched men seemed to see more or three times we had to halt while they rested.

After an hour or so of this traveling we came to a rough wooden hut and a landing-place. There was a guard in the hut, and they challenged us, and the sergeant answered. Then we went into the hut, where there was a smell of tobacco and whiskey, and a bright fire, and a lamp, and a certain amount of muskets, and a low wooden bedstead, like an immense mangle without the machinery, on which a few dark sheets or dozen soldiers all at once. Three or four soldiers who lay upon it were not much interested in us, but just lifted their heads and took a stare, and then lay down again. The sergeant made some kind of report, and some entry in a book, and then the convict whom I call the other convict, was drafted off with his guard to go on board first.

My convict never looked at me, except that once that I have mentioned. While we stood in the hut, he stood before the fire looking at it, or putting up his miserable feet by turns upon the hob and looking at them as if he pitied them. When his guard was all mustered, and remarked,

"I wish to say something respecting this escape. It may prevent some persons laying under suspicion alonger me."

"You can say what you like," returned the sergeant, standing looking at him with his arms folded; "but you have no call to say it here, you know. You'll have opportunity enough to say about it, and hear about it, before it's done with."

"I know that, but this is another pint, a separate pint. A man can't starve; at least / can't. I took some victuals up at the time we were yonder—where the church stands a-most out on the marshes."

"You mean stole?" said the sergeant.

"Ah! I'll tell you where from. From the blacksmith's."

"Hallo!" said the sergeant, staring at Joe.

"Hallo, Pip!" said Joe, staring at me.

"It was some broken victuals—that's what it was—and a dram of liquor, and a pie."

"Have you happened to miss such an article as a pie, blacksmith?" asked the sergeant confidentially.

"Mrs. Joe did, at the very moment when you came in. Don't you know, Pip?"

"Oh!" said my convict to Joe, in a moody manner, and without the least glance at me, "if so you're the blacksmith, are you? Then I'm sorry to say I've eat your pie."

"God knows you're welcome to it—so far as it was ever mine," returned Joe, with a saving remembrance of Mrs. Joe. "We don't know what you have known; but we wouldn't have you starved to death for it, miserable fellow-creature, whatever it was. Would us, Pip?"

The something that I had noticed before clicked in the man's throat again, and he turned his back. The boat had returned, and his guard were ready, so we followed him to the landing-place, made of rough stakes and stones, and saw him put into the boat, which was rowed by a crew of convicts like himself. No one appeared glad to see him, or sorry to see him, or spoke a word, except that somebody called as if to dogs, "Give way, you!" which was the signal for the dip of the oars. By the light of the torches we saw the black Hulk lying out a little way from the mud of the shore, like a wicked Noah's ark; cribbed, and barred, and anchored by massive rusty chains, the prison-ship was turned into a prison. When we saw the boat go alongside, and we saw him taken up the side and disappear, Then the ends of the torches were flung hissing into the water, and went out, as if it were all over with him.

ALONE.

A RESTLESS, sad, longing little heart was beating under a wire cloth-cage dress, in a house on Fourth Street. Tears as warm and grief-swollen as any that gush frog woman's eyes crept down the face of little why, paused, and then fell further, waited, trembled, and then swelling as the bosom swells with sighs, ran down the maiden's cheek, and dropped the faded chintz. Through and through, and through again, slipped the nimble needle, clicking with the thimble-finger of mother and linen and silk. The Argus-eyed thimble—nothing better than steel, though worn in the guise of silver—glittered and flashed, impressing it through the close fabric into the calloused finger-tip, fretted and notched and blackened by many another needle-thrust, piercing the weary day and many a weary night.

A cooking-stove, not a hundred, two beds, a few dishes in a shelf in the corner, a broom, a large stone pitcher, a bonnet and shawl, a few pieces of cast furniture. The window, with its rough wooden boxes on the window-sill, four or five books on the one table—these comprised the furniture.

The room was elevated far above the noise and dust of the city street—above the usual line of the smoke of many chimneys; and the roof in sloping had cut off a corner of the ceiling. The little low window—a part of it—caught and got the best they could with the sunlight, but were too much crowded by the filling roof to accomplish much.

Had you slipped noiselessly in—which you could not have done, in fact, for the sagging floor would have given a creaky scraping at the threshold—you would have been struck first by the barenness, and next by the scrupulous neatness of the room.

A little black-and-white kitten would have glanced up at you from a soft bed of cotton in its own corner, and sniffed, frightened, at the stove or bed of the two; and this bed heard upon the stairs, and mistaken for the step of the wife, before you reached the threshold, you would have heard a springing step upon the attic-floor, the door would have scraped open the long-unused grove, a pair of black eyes would have shone out at you from a face wreathed in smiles, and possibly in the darkest and least expected place you got a pair of arms about your neck. At any rate, you would have followed a tall, lithe figure into the room, and on taking your eyes from it, have found yourself sized-on with as expressive and proud a face as ever shone from comprehensive, airy brow, rustling silk, and sparkling diamonds.

Indeed, while the tear-drops were falling under the wire-cloth dress, and the needle-point was not possibly hide under its lifting lid, a step was heard upon the stairs, the staircase did creak; like the stage-driver's horn, with the sound of a rowing, the door did open, and a pair of arms were flung passionately about the neck of a white-haired old man.

Jennie had been crying of thoughts aroused by a brief visit to a spacious mansion in Washington.

She avoided these better thoroughfares when she could, hurrying along where the streets are narrow and dingy—where the glitter of gold and the tremble of plumes is seldom seen—where bright eyes and fair faces rarely look out from faded and worn surroundings. But this afternoon her errand to the store had taken her through one of the wider streets. Indeed, it carried her to the very corner of Main Street, around which human tides swept, eddying, ever hour. She had seen poverty, wealth, and wealth—misery, poverty, beauty—stupidity, sense, intellect.

Sitting at her low window in the dull, unseemly room, weary, discouraged, with the labors and forebodings of life, Jennie's thoughts could do no less than bring tears. She had seen the happiness which floated about her in the crowded street; of the laughing eye; of the haughty tread; of the luxurious home; of the contentment and conscious beauty. She had seen hundreds in that one street—hundreds of maidens to whom she was countless others, as far as any social recognition in the weeping girl. Does the doe imagine itself a small, or the eagle fancy itself a blue jay? Was it wrong that all this beauty, all this innate refinement, all this spirit and taste and mentality, should glory in itself, and have its proper appreciation for which we all long and strive? And if Jennie wept that her scant and faded calico had drawn the sneer, as though it were herself and not the accident of covering; and if she wept that simple-minded and narrow-thoughted girls carried themselves proudly, and won attention, while she slipped meanly into by-ways, and shrunk from the observation which was only cold and contemptible, can we blame her? She was a woman; with a woman's beauty and a woman's power. But she was a woman who was poor—terribly poor, heels covered with the dust of labor, her young life hidden, and dull, and sad.

Besides, an incident at the store had wounded her severely, and reawakened her consciousness of weakness and semi-degradation. It was this: She had taken a bundle of work to the inspecting clerk, and thence had been directed to the cashier with a ticket for her pay. On former occasions she had suffered from curious and wicked glances while passing the clerks of several departments, as well as from a peculiar tone in which the cashier addressed her. To-day she was either more painfully sensitive or the glances of attention were more disgustingly prominent; and the cashier, after fumbling as long as possible, handed her the silver she had earned with a careless but insulting remark. Jennie flashed with indignation, threw the money upon the counter, and curling her lip with scorn left the desk. A hand touched her arm, and a kind voice said, "Wait a moment, Miss Dell," in no assured and confident tone. She did wait, involuntarily paused. The gentleman stepped up to the cashier, struck him a smart blow on the side of his face with the palm of his hand, tipping him over, took the vacated stool at the desk, and by the time Joe Dell had picked himself up, had balanced his account, was ready for him with the residue of his wages. Then leading the fellow to the door for his way, paused, and bowed him out. All this was done so coolly, with so much ease and gentlemanly dignity that Jennie could take no exception to even the last act of the drama.

"My store will be safe to you in future, Miss Dell, but I shall not be here to the inconvenience of bringing your work. I will send a boy for it," and directing a lad to take the lady's bundle, Mr. Brewer leaned upon the desk of the store before she had time to cry or do any thing more than thank him with a glance, which, bursting from her eyes in indignation, was instantly intermingling of pride and gratitude.

The incident had recalled for the hundredth time a terrible consciousness of her unprotected situation, and she felt more keenly than ever the utter helplessness of her position. Sometimes the blood of a proud ancestry flushed to her cheeks and throbbed at her temples; but the next instant woman tears chased each other down her cheeks.

"I am so glad you have come, father. I have been so very lonely, and then I was fearful something had happened."

The old man bent a little to kiss the eyes of his daughter—a gentle reproof—was the emphasis of his affection—and his lips were moistened by a tear which Jennie had unwittingly left there in the haste of hastening the way to meet his coming step.

"What is this, daughter? Crying, my child? You are not sick, dear? Why, I thought my brave girl never cried, however dark the day might be;" and with a playful, fatherly rebuke, the white-haired man held the bright-faced daughter at arm's-length before him, gazing loving inquiries into her eyes.

Not a tear was there, but in the tenderness of the daughter now; so, after meeting his gaze laughingly a moment, Jennie slipped to his knee, pressed down his hands, clasping his arm in her hands, and said,

"Oh, nothing of any moment, father. We women have little foolish thoughts and troubles of our own when we are left alone all day. But when father comes home, and Jennie is happy enough, isn't she?" and the girl looked into his face with so much of beauty, and smile, and joy, that the old man forgot the tear-drop which had dried on his lips, and went to wondering what made his daughter so happy, alone and hard at work in that solar room of hers.

The father forgot the sadness sooner for a jewel of good thinking which he was holding tight in his heart, longing to give it his daughter, but wondering what was the most perfect way to show it. The father to-day, as he was holding tight in both the Koh-i-nor to flash with its dimmed lightning full in her face at once, or to let it drop gently to her feet, so that the gem might catch its brilliance, ray by ray, and beam by beam. While the daughter was looking for the gem, and the father was pouring sputtering water into the little black teapot, in the bottom of which very few but very nice little tea-leaves lay in fragrant exclusiveness and concentration, the glad father thought the matter over. While the torpid little leaves were soaking into inevitable decoction by the heated flood, the glad father continued to think it over.

"You look tired, father; have you worked hard to-day?"

"Not very, daughter."

"Why you are pale, father; you are sick, I know."

It was well that the girl dropped the plate from her hand, though it went down with a crackle into fragments, for the old man was reeling out of his chair. She was not sick, she was here. While out a word, the daughter held him a moment, till she could glance into his face, and then with a strength which she would always command when roused, bore him to the nearest bed and laid him there.

"Father! father!"

Not a word nor a sign of consciousness. Jennie bathed his temples with water, rubbed his arms, hands, his chest, called on him, kissed him, and wept. His lips move.

"What is it, father?" and the daughter's ear is close by the trembling lips.

"I—my heart"—faintly — "from — Robert"—fainter. "Dead"—he is"—the voice is too faint to be heard—the lips cease to move—the old man is dead. "Dead! dead! dead, our father!" Such are the sighs of hands, no bathings of that calm, snowfringed brow will bring back the soul now freed at last from its cheerless imprisonment of eighty years.

Straighten the stiffening limbs, lose daughter; close tighter the eyelids; he is gone. And the secret hidden in that unfinished sentence—it, too, is gone, and we will you try to fathom its mystery. The blow was a terrible one. Not alone that this was her father, but the best, the noblest, the dearest of fathers. Not alone that this was her stay and companion, but her only support and her only friend. Now she was alone. Alone.

When all hope of restoration was gone Jennie stood erect a little way from the bed, her head bared to her hands, and let the tide of loss and loneness sweep over her. In that instant of time she drank the full cup and tasted each and every bitter ingredient. This made her calm, that nature might have sunk: she was lifted, strengthened. All the energies of her heart came into active life; and Jennie, new or quiet, lone or not, she was the same strong, self-conscious woman she had ever been. She was even more strong and more calm.

A quick step upon the stairs and a tareless rap at the door. It was the bright-faced lad with a letter.

"Mr. Brewer says as how this is nicer work, and you may send back the other bundle," said the bright-faced boy-like, as he stood gazing into the room, his face beaming with pleasure and expectation. "Miss Dell?" and the boy fell into awe-stricken quiet as he felt the presence of death.

The second day before the burial, when, with the aid of an old woman below, the body had been carefully prepared, a different step was heard upon the staircase, and a careful knock at the door. Mr. Brewer entered without a word, gave his hand, and sat down. Then gently alluding to her loss, asking to look on the features of her father, noticing her plants in the window, he led the conversation into appropriate channels, and, without a single preference, made Jennie to feel that she was a true and appreciative friend.

Gradually the talk receded from the sad topic, the chance of death to more general subjects—to such thoughts as we find written in books, and with conclusions as we arrive at long meditations and careful analysings. In this, her visitor was struck with the clearness and stretch of thought which the humble girl at his side—self-taught herself roused and quickened by the outdrawing influences of a superior but congenial mind.

Thence the conversation was brought gently to personal affairs, where, at length, a point was gained at which Mr. Brewer evidently aimed.

"Have you no other friends but this?"

"None in all the world, except, perhaps, a brother."

Mr. Brewer could scarcely ask a further question. Breaking the silence, Jennie said—

"I have a wicked brother. Robert, left us three years ago—he was only fifteen then—in the rush and excitement of gold-fever. Father and I, as he might bring back gold enough to make his father comfortable for life. We heard of his arrival and a promising beginning, but since—since. Two years ago we came to live at this end of the city, and possibly at that time he changed his location, did not write, and in his large excitement, so we have ours reached him. The other day, when father was at this house, he had received from him, for he said so just as he was dying; but the news itself died on his lips, and I have no hope whatever in his nature. Brother Robert was a noble boy, Sir—the bravest and best boy I ever knew."

Just here the tears would come, and a long silence followed.

Mr. Brewer had brought a purse with a little gold in it, thinking to slip it into the hand of the girl whose trials had so touched his sympathy; but when he saw her self-possession returned, he did not dare to do it: he could only ask, with the deepest respect,

"Can I do any service to you?"

"I thank you very much for your call, Mr. Brewer—very much. There is nothing that you can do for me—employ me, if my work pleases you."

We need to follow the plain board coffin—rough casket for such a father—to its place among the silent poor in the great city cemetery. If the dark shawl that hung close to the grave girls' form, chilled by the autumn wind, dropping tears upon the turf alone by the poor man's grave, under it and as warm as daughter's heart, and lived as rich a woman's nature, as ever moved gay and proud in the assemblies of the wealthy?

Jennie could not and would not leave the dear old room, hallowed now by the memory of a saintly father. But there also, there alone, was no objection to it now, for only a young and elastic tread waked the creakings in the long flight of old stairs.

The bright-faced boy came and went every day with a bundle. The work was done well, and the pay was so much better as to give a new chintz of a deep brown with a tiny white figure. Mr. Brewer came occasionally. He still quietly kept the place of a friend, brought books for Jennie to read, and then discussed their contents with her.

There were also private times which they agreed, and many upon which they differed. Both liked very well to differ, for there was no difference in meaning his deep, earnest strength of expression, and he was never weary of awakening that flash of her large brown eyes and deep dignity of talk which severed her from all other of his friends.

Mr. Brewer's calls were not frequent, but they never failed when any peculiar interest in which she cast and saved in the humble attic-room.

Also for the struggling, proud, brave, and weary girl! These visits, so comforting at first, were coming to be a source of pain—in fact, and especially in prospect.

He came and went as a kind, disinterested friend, always considerate and appreciative, but always self-poised. Jennie, as she looked upon him as a true friend, she yet knew nothing of the man but what she saw in her own home. He never talked of himself. The lad who came and went with bundles had once or twice spoken of "father" in a manner which convinced her that Mr. Brewer was a husband, and this his son. That was all; but it was decisive. And yet, though settled on this first fact, as time wore on the companionship and sympathy of her one visitor grew into a need, and then a necessity. To remaining walks of friendship, no self-condemnation even, could stay the growth of that giant presence by which at last she was covered and overpowered. In vain Jennie flashed indignation on herself that she should love the lored of another woman heart,—a husband and father. In vain she wept, and struggled, and prayed. The chains grew tighter and tighter, holding her to a misery to which all the sadnesses of her life bore no comparison.

The afternoon sun of a September Sabbath wrapped in a cheery light the dark, sea-washed hull of an ocean steamer coming up the bay to the crowded pier.

At the same moment Jennie's friend turned down a dull, dark street, entered a door-way, and ascended creaking stairs. It was not the first time that Jennie's room that, far away over the brick houses, with their smoked and smoking chimneys, lay the always changing picture of the bay, the valley, afar or a long discussion of the beauties and blemishes, first of "The Old Curiosity Shop," and then of De Quincey's "Confessions," with other and minor talk, Jennie touched upon the scenery of the bay, with its white-winged butterflies and the black sea-bird that, an hour or two before, had been crawling up the harbor.

"I always think," she said, "when I look out upon the harbor, that perhaps some day it will bring my brave brother home to me; and then I shall not be alone, nor unhappy, nor tired any more. Oh! if I could only know whether he is living or dead—whether I shall ever have him again!"

The tears would come and her eyes were blinded, so she looked into the face of her friend.

Mr. Brewer seemed absent, yet present; tender, yet ill at ease. The thought that came to Jennie was,

"Perhaps he knows more of my brother than I"—it was so new a thing to see him perturbed.

"Have I ever told you any thing of myself?" he asked, at length.

"Never."

Jennie inquired—he couldn't find her voice.

"Will I? I always have."

When they met both found words for other sentences, and Jennie had been talking, Mr. Brewer exclaimed,

"Married! I never even loved before."

A slow step was heard on the staircase, a gentle rap at the door, and a pale young man entered.

"Jennie!"

"Robert!"

And the maiden had another joy added to the sweetest bliss of life.

But Robert had come home to die—to die as the day dies, slowly—he couldn't find her voice.

He had brought the gold which he had spent his young life in earning for the two at home. One had no need of gold now: it could do her no wish for it, but the dust was hers; and when the wrecks had gone to which they had sweetened his receding with the breath of love, leaving him at last where flowers grown upon living stalks, and chains and sisters can no more reach, made to the last home beautiful, it flowed from her own and her husband's hands in channels which gladdened many a poor girl's life, and made the heart of her other noble self happier for the joy of thus making his lost life known again in many a relighted eye and rekindled cheek.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL BLACK ON SECESSION.

THE Herald says: "In the opinion of the Attorney-General, stated by President Buchanan, the Union is a Union of law arising out of apprehended difficulties between the Northern and Southern States. Judge Black sets forth the important question of the constitutional right of a State to secede, but several other questions which are involved, such as the collection of revenues, and whether ports of entry can be changed or removed to other points, and the grant of the resignation of the Federal officers—the Collectors, Marshals, District Attorneys, &c., in the seceding States—the State or States could be found willing to accept the positions, and the question whether the President or Congress of the United States can make any provision for the emergency. In fact, all the questions which may arise in all their various aspects, are understood and fully considered. He holds, it is said, in the first instance, that a State has not the constitutional right to secede, and that it is the opinion of the law officer of the Government, it will have great weight and influence with the people of the South.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

Governor Gist's Message was sent to the Legislature at Columbia on the 5th inst. The Message, coming from a Cotton State policy, says there can be no difference of opinion on the importance of establishing diplomatic relations with Great Britain and Liverpool. It was important to divert part of the commerce of the world from New York and other cities to Charleston, and thus build up a commercial emporium and supply merchants of neighboring States. The effect of the secession of South Carolina from the Union it bestows doubly important. The Government of the United States to secure a share of the rich in establishing direct trade, and especially in the item of direct cotton exportation with Liverpool. He recommends the adoption of postal arrangements to supersede the United States mails, also the enactment of laws for the summary punishment of all persons tampering with slaves, and for the more effectual fencing the Carolinian Maritime School as a nursery for a navy. He recommends the adoption of measures to put the militia in a condition for active service. Governor Gist then takes up the question of secession, and says it is time now to move preparations for conference, and the State would be ready to act in concert after having deliberately decided on her course, to obtain any proposition looking to a continuance in the Federal Union. We can get no better or safer guarantee than the present Constitution, and that has proved impotent to protect us against the fanaticism of the North. The installation of slavery must be under the exclusive control of those directly interested in its preservation, and to look to the mercy of those who believe it to be their duty to destroy it, is to thus speake against the laws of nature and the Godcides thus: "It follows, from the views presented, that the United Government can at this time do nothing to prevent or force her back, nor rightfully use force to prevent a State from seceding, or force her back into the Union; but, in the language of the late Judge Harper, men having arms in their hands may use them; and I can see no eventuality ever upon you the importance of arming the State at the earliest practicable period, and thus be prepared for the worst. It is gratifying to know that, if we must resort to arms in defence of our rights, and a blow should be struck at South Carolina, the whole country will move up in line, we have the number of volunteers ready for the Southern and eastern States, and will soon repair the promptly to our assistance and share our fortunes. We are not without a military force; it may be filled with zeal, but, as a body, has not yet been tested in the discharge of our duty, with an unwavering trust in God, and a conscientiousness that any thing is preferable to dishonor and degradation."

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S REPORT.

The Attorney-General's report contains much interesting details on the revision of the land tax. He says over 10,000,000 acres have been surveyed, leaving 10,000,000 acres to survey, agreeably to the law of 1855, when several of these States were north-mountainous districts. He advises an abolition of the law to increase the revenue; he objects to the issue of bonds and warrants, but endorses the limitations as relevant as Northern banks; he advises, incidentally, a grant to Cuba, Nicaragua, and the capital of the Southern Confederacy. The public debt, in stocks and bonds, is $64,000,000. The estimates of taxes are $600,000; average tax on lands, a fraction less than five cents per acre.

APPROACH OF SECESSION.

A dispatch to the Herald from Charleston says: "It is now considered certain here that the ordinance of secession will be passed either on the 17th or 18th of December. Mr. Hammond has written a letter to the Georgia secession Convention, which body meets on the 16th, urging of the Union, high, dry, and forever, by December 18th at farthest. Many conservatives are here. Mr. Commissioner Wm. Porcher Miles goes to-morrow. Ordnance and ammunition are coming from the United States arsenal at Fort Moultrie. Some of the army officers say that now Moultrie is almost impregnable. The disposition of the people is decidedly to resist the landing of more troops there.

THE LEGISLATURE OF GEORGIA.

The House of Representatives met at Milledgeville Thursday. A motion was made to elect a Senator the same day, which was lost. The Senate repeals the law forbidding banks from sending their notes out of the State for the purpose of discrimination. It also repeals the restrictions against selling less sight checks, and in view of the present financial and monetary crisis, suspends the action of the acts inflicting the pain of forfeitures for not paying specie on demand. The Senate, by a large majority, suspended banks during suspension, provided, in either case, notice of suspension is given by the 1st of January next. In the Governor, with the exception of Chatham, Richmond, and Bibb, have given majorities.

THE MISSISSIPPI LEGISLATURE.

The Legislature organized on Jackson on 5th ult. The Governor's Message is delivered. The Senate is nearly unanimous. The members are unanimous for secession.

UNION SENTIMENT IN MARYLAND.

Governor Hicks' Message to the Legislature is perfect for a special session of the Legislature, declining to convene it. He is unwilling to call the Legislature in question of appearing to join in any treasonable designs against the Union, while he is ready to do his duty in case of the sending the rights of the South in the Union.

An association calling themselves the Southern Volunteers' displayed the Palmetto flag from their place of meeting at Baltimore on Saturday. The flag was torn down by the novelty of the thing, and the flag was greeted with cheers and hisses from the crowds, and was rescued from the Volunteers. Captain Jones, of the bark Jarkel, has arrested the Palmetto flag flying from the mast of his vessel, when all the ships in the vicinity immediately run up the stars and bars.

UNION MEETING AT LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY.

A citizens' meeting, composed of all parties, was held on the evening of 27th inst., "to express their sentiments before deploring the election of a President upon sectional issues, and because of the threats of disunion and civil war in the event of such election." Resolutions were adopted declaring that the election of Lincoln "is not a cause for disunion, but that the Constitution and the Union should be preserved;" that Congress should recommend the repeal of the Northern statutes nullifying the Fugitive Slave Law; appealing to the Southern States to do the same; that the Union of the South within the Union; and resolving that Kentucky will stand by the Union till aggressions on her constitutional rights become more intolerable than revolution.

ATTITUDE OF SENATOR MASON.

A letter in the Herald says: "Senator James M. Mason, of Virginia, whose fidelity to Virginia and the South no one can dispute, in a recent speech, referring to the contingency of Lincoln's election, declared that it would be a take his seat as a Senator to support and defend the Constitution, the rights and integrity of the Union, and when they could be no longer maintained, he should render back to the State his high trust, and return to Virginia, trusting to her wisdom and patriotism in that exigency to do her best."

MORE BANK SUSPENSIONS.

The Manufacturers' Bank of Pittsburg, Pa., suspended on 29th inst. Other Georgia banks are expected to suspend on the 20th inst. The Bank of Commerce, Charleston, S. C., on 29th ult. The Merchants' agreed to suspend specie payments. The banks of Augusta, Ga., Lexington, Fitchburg, and North Carolina have suspended.

RUPTURE OF RELATIONS WITH PERU.

The Government of Peru has ordered the Peruvian Minister Clay, stating that he had, pursuant to instructions, demanded his passports, and would not leave Peru immediately after this information came to the Executive, the Peruvian Minister has left Lima. The Peruvian Minister has settled with his passport, and thus all diplomatic intercourse between the two countries is suspended. The amount of unadjusted claims against Peru on account of his seizure and confiscation of the Chincha Islands guano is Lisbon Treasure is $150,000. Mr. Clay has been our Minister to Peru for nearly four years.

STEERAGE PASSENGERS SENT BACK FROM THE CASTLE.

The steamship Helvetia, which arrived from Savannah, Georgia, last week, brought back thirty-four steerage passengers to the Castle. The reason assigned for this summary course being pursued is that city as in Charleston—a State of quarantine. The returns from the custom-house are correct, the number of persons sent back from Charleston is 150, and Savannah 34.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION IN VIRGINIA.

A computation of the election returns in Virginia, which are not yet complete, shows that Breckinridge will receive 16 votes, Bell 8, and Douglas 1. The Legislature will stand 76 Democrats to 74. The returns from the counties of Wood and Isaac Parker, Jr., have been received, which require an addition of over two hundred votes to any one of the Democratic tickets. The Democrats have gained one vote, Breckinridge's electoral vote. This is a strange result.

MR. LINCOLN AT CHICAGO.

The Chicago Tribune relates some incidents of Mr. Lincoln's visit to that city. It says:

"Mr. Lincoln returns to Springfield, and Mr. Hamlin proceeds eastward from this city. Several interesting incidents are related of the reception. Mr. Lincoln has a very tall man, generally speaking, and the average level of those who came to congratulate him, and subjected all, as he did, with both hands, the taller performed by the shoulder-and-neck method, and the shorter by 'hand-moving.' At least, it was severe. In the crowd were many old friends, who had not seen Mr. Lincoln for pleasure experienced by Mr. Lincoln when he took a man by the hand cannot be described by any means. Many a man persons came after a long row of undelivered ones. Mr. Lincoln raised his hands in self-defence, ejaculated, and exclaimed, 'You are up, sure!' This was accompanied by a look that evoked much merriment. That tall man, Mr. ——, was in his line, only approximated.

"If the crowd was a little boy, some four years of age, and his mother. The child was holding over with enthusiasm, his cheeks glowed with pride, and he could not conceal his delight. In the act of, 'Let the little boy come,' Mr. Lincoln took him by the hand, pulled him over the railing, and treated to a turning forward on the ceiling, which was received with the utmost hilarity, and will be remembered through life by the boy."

PERSONAL.

Mr. Lincoln has returned home. On 27th he occupied himself principally with reading several hundred letters, accumulated during his absence. Mr. Lincoln is in possession of reliable private information from Kansas, showing the political condition of that Territory, affair to be greatly exaggerated, and no attack on the border Slave States intended.

The Washington Star says there is no reason to doubt the statement that Governor Wise, of Judge Taney, and that Judge Black will be nominated as his successor.

It is deemed probable that Mr. Yancey will be appointed by the Alabama Legislature Commissioner to attend the South Carolina Convention.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

ARRIVAL OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

The Prince of Wales' fleet has arrived. The details of the royal reception, and the first experience breakwinds and bad weather during the entire passage. The Prince left Halifax on the 19th, and reached Quebec on the 20th, having gone forward only further progress. They were detained by fog and ice, and on the 21st the Prince, Royal party, and suite were transferred to ash and preserved provisions. The party, however, landed all well, and the Prince reached Windsor Castle on the evening of the 25th.

THE FEELING OF THE BRITISH ON HIS RECEPTION.

At a public banquet in London, Lord Palmerston then said: "You have alluded to an event which has awakened the deepest interest in the mind of every Englishman.—I allude to the visit of the Prince of Wales to the North American Continent. It was to be expected that when the future hope of England and the subject of the loyalty and affection of the people should be called upon to visit one of our North American Provinces he would be received with hearty manifestations of welcome. But I must say it has reached people. Our anticipations have not been disappointed. The reception which the Prince has met with from the people who gave it, and honorable to the family of which he is the distinguished member; and we may hope that that visit will cement more closely than ties which, at least, are honorable to both together that portion of the Queen's dominions and the mother country. [Hear, hear.] I am sure that the feeling which pervades every loyal Englishman will be that the United States he would be received with the same loyalty and affection by the civilized nations accord to distinguished members of the reigning family of countries. But I must say it has been most gratifying to witness the cordiality, the hearty welcome, the enthusiastic loyalty which, on that occasion, the assembled people of the United States have shown to the Prince. [Hear, hear.] In our colonies in the United States [cheers], we have a population which, indeed, to be noble and generous people—they have shown that they have a full appreciation of the high honor which on that occasion was sprung; and, in spite of events which, if not hurt in others, have left a painful impression on the minds of the people of these kingdoms. I believe the memory of the Prince's visit will be treasured in the breasts of the American nation, and that those mutual recollections will tend to draw closer and closer the bonds that have long existed between the same noble and I will say illustrious stock."

MR. DALLAS AT COURT.

A dispatch, dated 30th ult., says: "The United States Minister, Mr. Dallas, Lord Palmerston, and Lord John Russell left London this morning for Windsor. The Observer remarks that the invitation of Mr. Dallas to Windsor Castle is the first case after the arrival of the Prince of Wales, in company with the hands of the Government, and is a proof that a grateful appreciation of the hospitality of the President, and the attention paid to the Prince of Wales by the United States officials, is felt by all ranks and classes of the people of the United States."

COMMENCEMENT OF THE COMMERCIAL PANIC IN ENGLAND.

The minimum rate of discount was raised by the Bank of England, on the 15th inst., to 6 per cent., although no gold was taken out, and the bullion was not reduced. This movement was telegraphed to the Bank of France, and the latter, considering the withdrawal of specie only from the Bank of England by that Bank was suspended. Advancing also to 6 per cent. on the following day, the 16th inst., which was immediately bought for the Bank of France, and the latter was prevented all further withdrawal from the Bank of England.

THE RISE IN THE RATE OF DISCOUNT IN ENGLAND.

The London Times says: "Her Majesty the Empress of the French, traveling in the strictest incognita as part of the suite of the Prince of Wales, crossed the Channel on Wednesday in the ordinary packet Alliance, and proceeded to London the same evening. From London Bridge station she and her suite went in common omnibuses to Cartright's hotel, Jermyn street; and it was not until they had been there for some time in the hotel that the Empress was recognized.

The Empress went out on a foot early morning, and was followed by a crowd of curious in the neighborhood of her hotel. She returned to Paris by the mail train, some carriages from a neighboring livery stable, and visiting the Crystal Palace.

"It is understood that her Imperial Majesty visits Scotland, in the course of a few days, incognita also; and that it was originally her intention to proceed directly by the Great North of Scotland Railway, but the limited period of the session decided her Majesty's advisers to reject the shorter route, and she will probably set out tomorrow by railway for Hamilton Palace.

"The Duke and Duchess of Hamilton intend to give a great ball at Hamilton Palace on the 20th inst., in honor of the Empress's visit.

"A letter says that, on leaving the Empress at the railway station, the Emperor went to the Tuileries, where he presided at a Council of his Ministers, at the termination of which he left for Compiegne. The Empress will remain for a few days. The ladies and gentlemen forming the Court will be also routine during the stay there."

FRANCE.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH ENGLAND.

The commercial treaty of France and England was completed at Paris on the 16th and bestowed final signatures. Mr. Cobden was said to be completely prostrated by his labors.

ITALY.

DEPARTURE OF GARIBALDI.

We read in the London Times and London Chronicle, dated Naples, November 2: "Garibaldi is gone. Last night it was asserted that his departure had been indefinitely adjourned. A sudden resolution, however, was come to, and early this morning he sailed in the Washington for Caprera. Nobody except his immediate friends, and not all of them, was aware of his final resolve, and, in consequence, he slipped away at break of day, unattended, and almost unknown. To the last he refused every thing from the King, and drew nothing from the Treasury but his general officer's pay of five francs a day; and even that he has given, he actually borrowed a few crowns from several friends in Naples to pay the small debts he had incurred here in his household.

HIS FAREWELL ADDRESS.

"Caprera, November 8, 1860.

"TO MY COMPANIONS IN ARMS: We must now consider the period which has just finished as one that has stood out in our national resurrection, and prepare ourselves to finish worthily the noble work. By the help of the chief of constellations, the completion of which Providence has reserved for this fortunate land, we will, from Venice, bring peace to you an undertaking which has been marked by the applause of the world. Let us, then, unanimously, as your country's history another more glorious still will be added, and the sun shall not rise at last to the brightest shall not rise at last to the brightest a sharpened sword forged from the links of his fetters. To arms, then, all of you, and the oppressors and the neglect will disappear like the dust.

"Yes, let us, then, turn any old cowards from your arms, that will only give you cowards for children, and you who are the true fathers of the land of Latin men bear children who are noble and brave. Let timid doctrines be cast out from among us. Providence has associated Italy with Victor Emanuel, and by the side of Victor Emanuel every honest man should be found.

"Does more I repeat my battle cry—To arms, all of you! Rome, 1861, and Italy will be constituted of Italians from this time for liberty! Also for Hungary! Let the March of Italy be that of necessity, of fraternity, and peace.

"Italians of Calatafimi, Palermo, Volturno, Ancona, Castelfidardo, and Isernia, every one of you who is not a coward or a slave, is our ode. All of us, all of us, by us, standing around the glorious flag of Italy, will strike the last blow at the crumbling edifice of tyranny.

"Brothers, volunteers, and countrymen and soldiers, one word of farewell from me to-day. I am obliged to retire; but I do not go far from you. My heart will still find me with you again. Let there only return to their homes who are the sick and the wounded, and their families, and those who by their wounds have deserved the gratitude of the country. Let every one of Italy in their homes by their councils and the very aspect of their noble wounds. Let all who are able to bear arms hasten to guard our glorious banners.

"We shall meet on the long again to march together for the redemption of our brethren who are still the slaves of the oppressor.

"We shall meet again ere long, and march together to the conquest.

HIS POVERTY.

A letter from Count Arese, of Novara, in the Presse, says: "King Victor Emanuel is coming, and Garibaldi is going. This, at least, is the general opinion. Garibaldi having told his secretary and two aides-de-camp to hold themselves in readiness to follow him, he has announced to a remind him that he was absolutely without money, and that he would not have to pay for his passage and those for his voyage. The fact is that the man who has given to the Peninsula a new existence has not the slightest excess of pay or salary for himself. Unless he withdraws his resignation of the dictatorship, the Government owes any—and it is not thought that he will—Garibaldi will have nothing to live on after the 9th inst. The Sicilian millions has hitherto never produced more than 1500 francs (£60) a month. Such is the real position of the man who conquered the Neapolitan Bourbons, and added one of the most splendid jewels to the crown of Victor Emanuel."

THE LATEST FROM THE BELLIGERENTS.

At latest dates there was a report that a conspiracy had been discovered in the army of Francis II. Three officers and two men were shot. After a combat on the 15th, the Piedmontese had taken Isernia, and the Neapolitan garrison had retired to the fortified Venafro. If we had been executed of eighteen battalions, but a dispatch announces the surrender of Capua on the 2d inst. Gaeta is invested by the left Gesta with troops, supposed for Civita Vecchia. The Admiral at Naples lodged in the Government house of Garibaldi and the Dictatorship, and were dispersed by the troops. Victor Emanuel had prohibited the destruction of Fort Stellon.

BANKRUPTCY OF THE POPE.

The following letter has been addressed to Cardinal Wiseman by his Eminence Cardinal Antonelli, the secretary of State to the Pope, dated Rome, 1st November, on the systematic solicitation of St. Peter's pence throughout every portion of England. It replaces the usual letter of the Papal treasury at Rome.

"ROME, OCT. 6, 1860.

"MY LORD CARDINAL,—The resources of the public treasury, which, during the last few months, of the progress of the revolution, have now become of no account, as the suppression of the Papal States has taken place, and has taken away from the Holy Father every source of meeting the heavy requirements of the Papal Government, and of all those relevant charges which, in order to find footing again from the violence which overwhelmed them from the fidelity they have sworn to their lawful sovereign. The Holy Father cannot abandon his subjects. Therefore, who will never consent to accept any offering of money or money, and any government which may be made to compacts and conditions would, on the other hand, see with pleasure that the Holy Father should not be left to his own existence with their penury. Having made known to your Eminence the state of affairs, I am sure that your Eminence says argument that I might urge that it might have a speedy end. [L.S.] I am, with sentiments of the esteem and will powerfully assist in its execution. I therefore beg you to take the trouble to call the attention of your colleagues in the pastoral office in England, to lay of them to the pious feelings which animate the faithful of England to them may concur in for assisting their common father in the heavy circumstances in which he finds himself, by means of his enemies, and of those even who profess themselves to be his friends. I shall be very grateful for this opportunity, while I kiss your Eminence's hands, again to profess myself, with profound esteem, your Eminence's truly obedient and devoted servant,

"G. C. ANTONELLI.

"To his Eminence Cardinal WISEMAN, London."

CHINA.

PROGRESS OF THE WAR.

The London Times publishes a long communication from its correspondent in China. The rupture of negotiations took place on the 18th inst. The allied army moved forward on Tekoo. On the 21st the Sikh fort on the right bank was taken after a severe struggle, defended by 2000 men. The place called Sinho, on the left bank of the mouth the English and French took that by the middle of the month the English and French had arrived at the point of the capital of which the Chinese were disposed to rodes, another battle must be fought. The advance was then made. The attack was a severe action, however, to have been that the Tartar army had been retained in the vicinity of the capital expressly for it is most probable that the appearance of the allies in the neighborhood of Pekin will be the signal for a general uprising of the part of the Imperial mandarins. It is probable that negotiations will be renewed, and every effort will be made by the army to re-attack before the approach of winter, but it seems far more likely that the capital had been taken and occupied, and that it will be held through the whole winter. No one can there be any reason to anticipate danger from such a proceeding, and the Times trusts to hear by the next mail that the two generals, in full exercise of Pekin, had imposed such terms on the enemy as would insure a long peace with the Celestial Empire.

GENERAL VIEW OF THE FORTIFICATIONS FOR THE D

THE FORTIFICATIONS FOR THE DEFENSE OF NEW YORK.

THE recent visits of the City Guard and the Fifth Regiment to the forts in our harbor, for the purpose of practicing firing with barbette guns, and the interest which has been created thereby among military men especially, offers a favorable opportunity of presenting our readers with the large picture on the two preceding pages, embracing a bird's-eye or perspective view of New York and vicinity, showing the relative location of the forts already built or in the course of erection, together with views of the same, and of saying a few words upon a subject of the highest and most vital importance, not only to our city and State, but to the nation at large.

Early in the year 1809 Major Barnard, of the United States Engineer corps, published a communication to the Hon. J. B. Floyd, Secretary of War, which was subsequently published by the New York Chamber of Commerce, in a pamphlet form, and entitled "Dangers and Defenses of New York." In this paper Major B. starts with an allusion to the sudden change which has taken place in the system of harbor defence since the war of 1812, and, indeed, since the Civil Engineer, in 1840, reported that the then existing fortifications in the harbor and on the shores of Staten and Long Islands, when in perfect order, would render our city pretty well from an attack by water through this passage (the Narrows). This change is consequent upon the recent improvements in the character of maritime warfare, and the means of maritime attack, as well as upon the fact that a war waged against this country by any other nation must be conducted upon different principles from those through which we have heretofore passed. On this subject Major B. says:

"While formidable invasions of our territory had been made by land, and would have made the name of Jackson's and Bull's Islands had proved sufficient to protect the city from attack by water, and to compel any land force to change its line of operations, or to abandon all attack of that day against fortification—how little was required to secure our security from such attacks. While the means of maritime attack have of late years assumed a formidable and overwhelming character, all of what can defensive system was planned, and our country has no assailable population, no interior line, no any resources that no enemy can hope to make any impression by an invasion of our territory, without many times places like New York here, on the other hand, invasion is even a greater proportion, by which alone it could make them objects of attack.

"The vastly deemed adequate in former years for the defense of New York could not, therefore, in the nature of things, be so considered at the present day.

"The recent war of England and France against Russia may illustrate our meaning: for it has shown in a most expert way either of these nations to wage war against the United States.

"As invasion of territory, no attempt at territorial conquest, was made or thought of, for it was evident that no decisive results would flow from such means. The war consisted solely in attacks upon commercial places of great sea-ports—centre of commercial and naval power. Such places, by their vast importance to the prosperity and prosperity of a nation—by the large populations and immense amount of wealth concentrated in them, and by their exposure to maritime attack, offer themselves at once as the most tempting objects of attack, and as the most profound. Cronstadt, Sebastopol, Archangel, Bomarsund, Kinburn, Petropawlski, and others, were the objects of attack, and were successfully or unsuccessfully attacked; while such as the first-named remain, indeed, the less made of war.

"Around Sebastopol assailed and sentinel gathered their numbers, and on the result of the same struggle may be said to have turned the issue of the war. Had it not been so decided there, Cronstadt would have been the next field of combat, for which, indeed, the Allies had made the most enormous preparations.

"It is not certain that in future all war of maritime power against the United States will take the character of a territorial invasion being out of the question, it is regulate our system and strength against such maritime attack—such as New York, New Orleans, and San Francisco—presenting the only properties for successful operations this efforts. Against these he will prepare such immense armaments as to subdue those by which alone they can resist agression of attack—which (unless much by a thoroughly defective system) shall inevitably succeed.

"The mere defense of the city against ordinary fleets is no longer the question, but towards the first dynasty to be here erected, the nation is to measure its strength against the most lavish use of the resources of a great maritime power, aided by all that modern science and mechanical skill can bring against them; in short, in fortifying New York we are really preparing the last defense by which the issue of future momentous contests is to be decided."

It needs no argument to prove the correctness of the position adopted by Major Barnard, as any one who will give a moment's thought to the consideration of the subject must be satisfied, that, with our immense population, accustomed to the use of arms—essentially a military people—with the telegraph and railroad lines to concentrate upon any given point tens of thousands of armed men, it would be madness in any nation to attempt to land an army upon our coast, with the object of marching any distance into the interior. The landing of an army from ships of war is a work requiring time, and, independent of the danger arising from storms on an exposed coast, before a large body of men with artillery and cavalry could be safely landed and intrenched, however numerous it might be, a force fourfold its numbers could be gathered to hurl it back into the sea, or, at least, to prevent it from marching a step inland. It must be apparent, therefore, that in any future wars which this country may wage with the nations of the world, our centres of trade and population must be the points of attack and resistance. The subject of the fortifications by which this great metropolis is defended is one, therefore, of no slight importance, and deserves the thoughtful consideration of all.

But we propose to elaborate it as its importance deserves—space forbids—but we feel that in calling attention to it we are doing only what our journalists, in awakening, or rather in extending an interest already awakened, which may at events rate in perfecting a system of defense so complete as to bid defiance to any hostile entrance within the waters of our harbor.

Let us see what were the defenses which were relied upon by the chief engineer in 1840, to "pretty well protect the city from an attack by water through the Narrows." At that time there were upon Staten Island Forts Tompkins and Richmond, and Batteries Morton and Hudson; on Long Island, Forts Hamilton and Lafayette, with Fort Columbus and Castle William on Governor's Island; Fort Wood on Bedloe's, and the works on Ellis's Island in the waters of the Upper Bay, and Castle Clinton, or Castle Garden, mounting from 450 to 500 guns all told. Of these, Forts Tompkins, Lafayette, Castle William, and Castle Clinton, although competent perhaps to resist the means of attack in vogue at the period of their erection, are worn than worthless at the present time in view of the new improvements in the means of maritime attack which have been made within the past twenty years; while all the rest, with the exception of Fort Hamilton, are more or less affording but partial protection to their garrisons.

Without entering into a full discussion of the question, which seems to have called forth able disputants on both sides, whether earth-works or casemated forts are the best for the defense of harbors, or rather, whether the expense of such casemated forts or castles is necessary, we will simply say that Major Barnard most ably refutes the arguments of the negative,* and demonstrates the absolute and imperative necessity of forts, and his opinion seems to have prevailed; for since 1840, Fort Schuyler, a casemated fort of great strength, and mounting 70 guns, has been erected at Throg's Point, at the entrance of the East River from Long Island Sound, and Fort Richmond, a large casemated structure, mounting 115 guns, the site of old Fort Richmond, a water battery on Staten Island, at the Narrows, has been erected, and a large work on Sandy Hook (probably the largest in this country), and a new work, on the site of Fort Wood, on Bedloe's, are now commenced. Thus we have in existence at the present time, or in course of erection:

For the relative positions of these we refer the reader to the map, while the engraving on page 781 will convey to the mind a better idea than any description we can give of their advantageous position, and of their strength, commanding, as they do, etc. These would, to the cursory observer, seem to be sufficient to guard the city against any attack from all ordinary attacks; but in view of the immense importance of the object to be defended, as well as of the application of the new system of warfare, it is thought necessary to increase the fortifications to such an extent as not only to prevent the vessel from passing, but to render it certain that under the fire of at least 300 guns at every point of a vessel's path, not a single shot or shell would reach the city. On this subject Major B. says:

"The lesson to be derived [from the war with Russia] by our country is that of the value of forts. Our own system of coast-line places would be the points at which alone an enemy could attempt to land, or to attack our ports. New York's pre-eminently. If it is left undefended, or is inadequately defended, its immense resources, in the shape of wealth and military and naval resources, the lives and property of its citizens will be placed at the absolute disposal of the war, at an unpitying enemy's mercy; and the following, which we have quoted, would ask you, is a degradation of its great commercial emporium. If, Bomarsund is shelled, the whole of the town is exploded by grenade rods and devastation to no more can and will be the result of the bombardment of New York, unless the most immense consequences—perhaps, as at Sebastopol, the fall of the war—ensue."

It is proposed, therefore, to augment the number of forts by constructing a work upon the West Bank (the bank which is opposite Governor's to the outer harbor, and another on Romer shoal, to defend the East and North rivers, and the main ship channel being under the fire of the fort on Sandy Hook); another on Coney Island, to prevent a landing—(it was at this point that the British landed to attack the city in the Revolution); additions to Fort Hamilton; a new casemated battery on Staten Island, and the reconstruction or remodeling of Fort Lafayette. A heavy work upon Rabbit's reef, to take a cross fire with Fort Lafayette and the Narrows, and to defend the outlet of "the Kills," is also proposed. These additions would complete the entrance to the harbor by way of Sandy Hook and the Narrows, impregnable to any force which might be brought against them.

Should Willets's Point, on Throg's Neck, be left, together with obstructions in the East River, would effectually prevent a passage being forced by way of the Sound.

The estimated cost of these additional fortifications we have referred to is about three millions—a large sum, it is true, but not more than the amount of revenue collected here in two months, and but a trifle to the amount of damage to the city and nation should an enemy's fleet be able to force an entrance to our harbor. It is to be hoped that the importance of the subject will induce legislation upon the subject.

Of the troops which would be their guns would require a force of 15,000 or 10,000 men. Of course the regular army is out of the question; and upon the militia and citizens of our city and its neighborhood would devolve—as it of right ought—the duty of defending their homes, their firesides, and their property. We are too apt, however, to boast of our volunteers as the strong right arm of our defense, forgetting that they would be of very little, if any, service when arms are placed in their hands to which they are totally unaccustomed. In this connection we might add that the system upon which our militia are armed is entirely out of date and obsolete, and if brought into the field against trained troops with improved arms, they would find their numbers would count for nothing, when opposed to the muscular strength, agility, and skill of the lawyers of the French Zouaves. Our militia have always been counted upon for service in the fortifications; but to be useful, they require to be drilled upon a system entirely different from that heretofore pursued, and the sooner this fact is made known and acted upon, the sooner will our boast have a basis in truth.

We do not intend to propose any plan or system upon which the militia should be organized or drilled in this connection; but we wish to throw out a few hints bearing upon the question, which seems to have called forth able disputants on both sides, whether earth-works or casemated forts are the best for the defense of harbors, or rather, whether the expense of such casemated forts or castles is necessary, we will simply say as Major Barnard most ably refutes the arguments of the negative,* and demonstrates the absolute and imperative necessity of forts, and his opinion seems to have prevailed; for since 1840, Fort Schuyler, a casemated fort of great strength, and mounting 70 guns, has been erected at Throg's Point, at the entrance of the East River from Long Island Sound, and Fort Richmond, a large casemated structure, mounting 115 guns, the site of old Fort Richmond, a water battery on Staten Island, at the Narrows, has been erected, and a large work on Sandy Hook (probably the largest in this country), and a new work, on the site of Fort Wood, on Bedloe's, are now commenced. which our militia are armed is entirely out of date and obsolete, and if brought into the field against trained troops with improved arms, they would find their numbers would count for nothing, when opposed to the muscular strength, agility, and skill of the lawyers of the French Zouaves. We do not intend to propose any plan or system upon which the militia should be organized or drilled in this connection; but we wish to throw out a few hints bearing upon the question of the most efficient means, leaving others more competent to elaborate them.

The forts and batteries, after being put in complete order, should be manned by a small body of regular troops, sufficient to keep them and their armaments in good order and do guard duty. Proper officers should be provided to drill the forces in the use of the guns and preserve discipline. The militia, augmented to 20,000 (ten per cent. of the population of the State would furnish 60,000), should be divided into detachments, proportionate to the strength, their company organizations, and assigned to the various forts, where they should be thoroughly drilled in the use of the guns and in repelling assaults upon the works. Each detachment would thus have its alarm post, to which, by aid of the numerous steamboats traversing the bay, they might be conveyed in a very short time. One of the forts nearest to the point at which it might be used as a fort, when not get-firing with barbette and casemated guns should be practiced, each detachment occupying it in turn.

That portion of the militia the batteries might constitute a reserve to cover exposed points, or relieve garrisons; and would have connected with it the cavalry and artillery. Thus, it seems to us, our volunteer soldiers would acquire a knowledge of the duty which must of necessity devolve upon them in case of war, and better subserve the purpose of their organization than in parading our streets in gay uniforms, rendering themselves obnoxious to the imputation of "playing soldiers." We are glad to see that some of the corps have made the attempt to acquire such a knowledge (and, if report says truly, with considerable success), and trust that all will follow the good example set them by the Fifth Regiment and the City Guard.

A DAY'S RIDE.

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXIV.

My reader is sufficiently acquainted with me by this time to be aware that no one quality in me on which he can always count with safety —my candor! There may be braver men and more ingenious men than I may be, I will not dispute it; persons more gifted with oratorical powers, better linguists, better mathematicians, and with finer moral principles; but I take my stand upon candor, and say, there never lived the man, woman, or monkey, who possessed a more open and undisguised section of himself than I have done, am doing, and hope to do to the end of the chapter. I would ask you, in reason why we have hitherto made so little progress in this greatest of all sciences—the knowledge of human nature? It is not because there are always engaged in speculating on what goes on in the world of thought, people as it were, what people are doing next door; instead of honestly recording what takes place in our own house?

You think this same candor is a small quality. Well, show me one thoroughly honest action recorded in history, from which you cannot their own memory, it is fair to presume some fifty-hundredth part of candor; some little of been deficient in truthfulness; some forgetful of early friendships, and so on. Yet where will you find a man who will ask one—the simplest—"I was a coward; I never could speak truth; I was by nature ungrateful?"

Now, I have gone through through such confessions as these our knowledge of humanity would be enriched. Show me the ship that makes her voyage without the loss of a spar or a rope teaches little; but there is a whole world of information in the log that tells where she sprung a hole in her, all her masts carried away, the captain invariably drunk, and the crew mutinous. Such records of misery and shame would excite witchcraft, marvelous resource, and indomitable perseverance. Then we come to estimate the variety of qualities that are only evoked by danger. Just as some gallant skipper might say, "I know that Archibald's weather fin is good, and so I dropped anchor in thirty fathoms, and determined to trust all to my cables!" or, "I perceived that we were settling down, so I cracked all canvas on, resolved to beach her." In the same spirit, I would like to read in some personal narrative, "Knowing that I could rely on my courage; feeling that if pressed hard I should certainly run away, I did so." But we only could get honesty like this! If some great statesman, some grand fore-ground figure of his age, would sit down to give his trials as they really occurred, we should learn more of life from one such volume than we glean from all the mock memoirs we have been reading for centuries!

It is the special pleading of these records that makes them so valueless; the writer always is bent on making out his case. It is the eternal representation of that spectacle dear to us all—pleasing to the gods—the good man struggling with adversity. But what we want to see is the weak man, the frail man, the man who has to fight adversity with an old rusty musket and a flint lock, instead of an Enfield rifle, loading at the breech.

I'd not give a rush to see Blondin cross the falls of Niagara on a tight-rope; but I'd cross the Atlantic to see, say the Lord Mayor of the Master of the Rolls try it.

Now, much-considered reader, do not for a moment suppose that I have, even in my most vainglorious of raptures, ever imagined that I was better than these records supplying the void I have pointed out. Remember that I have expressly told you, such confessions, to be valuable, ought to come from a great man. Painful as the avowal is, I am not a great man! Elevated as my position may be I have to say, it is true; but there are wants, deficiencies, small little details many of them—rivets and bolts, as it were—without which the machinery can't work; and I know this, and I feel it.

This digression has all grown out of my unwillingness to mention what occurred to me—that I passed my night at the little inn on the table where we supped. I had not courage to assert my right to my bed in the room's room, and so I wrapped myself in my cloak, and with my carpet-bag for a pillow, tried to sleep. It was no use—the most elastic spring-mattress and a down cushion would have failed that night to lull me. I was outraged beyond endurance: she had slighted, he had insulted me! Such a provocation as he gave me could have but one expiation. He could not, by any pretext, refuse me satisfaction. But was I so ready to ask it? Was it so very certain that I would insist upon this reparation? He was certain to wound, he might kill me! I believe I cried over that thought. I had to cut off in the bud all one's youth, in the very spring-time of one's enjoyment—I cannot say of one's military—to go down unnoticed to the grave, never appreciated, never understood, with vulgar and mistaken judgments ever attributed to me. Sometimes I thought my heart would burst with the afflictions of such a picture, and I said, "No, Potts, you—live, and prove to the world your blunderers by the exercise of the qualities of your great nature." Then the beautiful little episodes came thronging to my memory—that noon, when whose personal gallantry had won them a world-wide renown, refusing to fire on a dead.

"We are to storm the citadel to-morrow, colonel," said one; "let us see which of us will be first up the breach." Hove I lived to follow for his speech, and I tortured my mind how, as there was no breach to be carried by assault, I could apply its wisdom to my own case. What if I were to say, "Could the world is before us—a world full of trials and triumphs—let us who has best acquitted himself in the conflict?" I wonder what he would say. Cæsar, Germans are a strange, imaginative, dreamy sort of folk, and it not likely that he would be struck by a notion so undeniably original? In fact, I conclude that he would seize my hand with rapture, and say, "Ja! I agree!" Still, it is possible that he might not; in those vulgar, matter-of-fact creatures who will regard nothing through the tinted glass of fancy; he might ridicule the project, and tell it at breakfast as a joke. I felt almost smothered as this notion crossed me.

I next bethought me of the privileges of my rank. Could I, as an H.B., accept the vulgar assertion of my opponent? Certainly not! I could not condescend to derogatory in one to whom great attributes might one day be committed? Not that I desired to be a party to a quarrel, or to the delusion of being a prince; but that I felt, if the line of conduct would be honorable to me men in my rank and condition, it inevitably followed that it must be bad. What I could neither do as the descendant of St. Louis, or the son of Peter Potts, must needs be wrong. These were the grievous meditations that kept me long night; and though I arose from the hard table weary, and with aching bones, I blessed the pinkish-gray light that came to relieve me. By the time I completed a very rapid toilet when François came with a message from Mrs. Keates, "hoping it had rested me after my journey, and to what hour it was my pleasure to continue the journey." There was an evident astonishment in the fellow's face at the equanimity with which he was charged; and though he delivered the message with considerable propriety, there was a certain something in his look that said, "What delusion is this you have thrown around the old lady?"

"Say that I am ready, François; that I am even impatient to be off, and the sooner we start the better."

This I uttered with all my heart; for I was eager to get away from the spot where Grimston should be stirring, and could not subdue my anxiety to avoid meeting him again. There was every reason to expect that he would start off unnoticed, and I hastened on myself to order the horses and stimulate the stillness to greater activity. This was no labor of love, I promise you! The sluggardly inertness of that people seems all but incredible to Anglo-Saxon organs, even bribes could not move them. They never admitted such a possibility as haste, and stumped about in their wooden shoes or iron-bound boots, searching for articles of horse-gear under bundles of hay or stacks of fire-wood, as though it was the very first time in their lives that postboys had ever been required in that locality.

"Make a great people out of such materials as these!" muttered I; "what rubbish to imagine it! How, with such intolerable apathy, are they to be moved? Where every thing proceeds at the same regulated slowness, how can justice ever overtake crime? When can truth come up with falsehood? Whichever starts first here must inevitably win. To urge the creatures on by example, I assisted with my own hands to put on the harness; not, I will own, with much advantage to speed, for I put the collar on upside down, and, in revenge for the indignity, the beast planted one of his feet upon me, and almost drove the east of his shoe through my instep. Almost mad with pain and passion, I limped away into the garden, and sat down in a damp summer-house. A shaggy mastiff, a lazy hostler, and a bruised foot, are, after all, not stunning calamities; but there are moments when our jarred nerves jangle at the slightest touch, and even the most trivial inconveniences grow to the size of life afflictions.

"We began to fear you were lost, Sir," said François, breaking in upon my gloomy reverie, I can say how long after. "They have been at the door this half hour, and all the house searching after you."

I did not deign a reply, but followed him, as he led me by a short path to the house. Mrs. Keates and Miss Herbert had taken their places inside the carriage, and, to my ineffable disgust, there was the German chatting with them at the door, and actually presenting a bouquet the landlord had just fetched out to her. Unable to confront the fellow with that contemptuous indifference which I knew with a little time and preparation I could summon to my aid, I urged on to my leathern attic and let down the blinds.

"Do you mean," said I, through a small slit in my curtain, "do you mean to say that you're there all day?" Will you never drive on?" And now and then, as the bolts and a great cordage, like what announces the launch of a small ship, the heavy conveniency lurched, surged, and, after two or three successful bounds, lumbered along, and we started on our day's journey. As we bumped along, I remembered that I had never visited the baths in the morning, nor addressed them in any way; so completely had my selfish preoccupation immersed me in my own annoyances, that I actually forgot the commonest attentions of everyday life. I was pained by this reminder on my part, and waited with impatience for our first change of horses to repair my omission. Before, however, we had gone a couple of miles, the little window at my back was opened, and I heard the old lady's voice, asking if I had ever chanced upon a more comfortable country inn, or with better beds?

"Not half so bad," said I, tiredly. "I had such a mass of letters to write that I got little sleep. In fact, I scarcely could say I took any rest."

While the old lady expressed her regretful condolences at this, I saw that Miss Herbert pinched her lips together as if to avoid a laugh, and the bitter thought crossed me, "She knows it all!"

"I am easily put out, besides," said I. "That is, at certain times I am easily irritated, and a vehicle without a fellow who appreciates last night so ruffled my temper, that I assure you he continued to go through my head till morning."

"Oh, don't call him vulgar" broke in Miss Herbert, in anger. "surely there could be nothing more quiet or unpretending than his manners."

"If I were to hunt for an epithet for a month," retorted I, "a more suitable one would never occur to me. The fellow was evidently an actor of some kind—perhaps an opera dancer."

She burst in with an exclamation, but at the same time Mrs. Keates interposed, and though her words were perfectly inaudible to me, I had no difficulty in guessing their import, and knew that the young person was undergoing a pretty smart lecture for her presumption in daring to differ in opinion with my royal highness. I suppose it was very ignoble of me, but I was delighted at it. I felt right glad that the old woman administered that sharp castigation, and I burned even with impatience to throw in a shell myself and hasten the discomfiture. Mrs. Keates finished her gallop at last, and I took up the running.

"You were fortunate, Madam," said I, "in the indisposition that confined you to your room, and which kept you from the unpleasant presumption of this man's manners. I have traveled much, I have mixed largely, I may say with every rank and condition, and in every country of Europe, so that I am not pronouncing the opinion of one totally inadequate to form a judgment—"

"Certainly not, Sir. Listen to that, young lady," muttered she, in a sort of undertone.

"In fact," resumed I, "it is one of my especial amusements to observe and note the forms of civilization as implied by mere common habits. If, from circumstances not necessary to particularize, certain advantages that favored this pursuit—"

When I had reached thus far in my very pompous preface, the clatter of a horse coming up at full speed arrested my attention, and at the very moment the German himself, the identical whom we talk, dashed up to the door, reined in his steed, with a few polite words, handed in a small volume to Miss Herbert, which, it seems, he had promised to give her, but could not accomplish before in consequence of the abrupt haste of our departure. The explanation did not occupy an entire minute, and he was gone and out of sight at once. And now the little window was closed, and I could distinctly hear that Mrs. Keates was engaged in one of those literary exercises by which she communicates its experiences to youth. I wished I could have opened a little chink to listen to it, but I could not do so undetected, so I had to console myself by imagining all the shrewd and disagreeable remarks she must have made. Morals has its rhubarb as well as medicine—wholesale, doubtless, when down, but marvelously nauseous and very hard to swallow; and I felt that the young person was getting a full dose. Indeed, I could catch two very significant words, which came and came again in the allocution, and the very utterance of which addled to their sharpness: "levity," "encouragement." There they were again!

"I say, oh, old lady," muttered I; "your precepts are sound; never was there a case more meet for their application. Never mind a little pain either—one must touch the quick to make the cautery effectual. She will be all the better for the lesson, and I am right heartily edified!"

"Pots! Pots! Pots! was not this very hardhearted and ungenerous? Why should the sorrow of that young creature have been a pleasure to you? Is it possible that the mere excitement of revenge has had any share in this? Are you angry with her that she liked that man's conversation better than his? Is that reference to you? You surely can not be actuated for a motive so base as this? Is it for herself, for her own advantage, that you resented it? you are thinking all this time? Of course it is. And there you stand, I could tell the scene, I describe a crying; the old lady has really come to the quick, and I believe is not going to stop there.

"Well," thought I, "old ladies are an excellent invention; none of those cutting severities could be done by one but them. And you have a patient persistence in this surgery quite wonderful, for when they have stayed the instant all over, they sprinkle on salt as carefully as if they were frosting a plum-cake."

At last, I did hear the door close over. She surely must have addressed herself to every phase of the question in an hour and a half, and I could have sworn that she had touched on me as though the efficacy of her precepts, like a homœopathic medicine, lay in infinitesimal attrituration. Fortunately, we had to halt for fresh horses, and so I got down to chat with them at the carriage door, and interrupt the lecture. Little was I prepared for the reddened eyes and quivering lips of that poor girl, as she drank off the glass of water which I offered her. She did not still less for the few words she contrived to utter in reply to me, as I took the glass from her hands.

"I hope you have made me miserable enough now."

And with this the window was banged to, and away we went.

CHAPTER XXV.

I WAS so hurt by the last words of Miss Herbert to me, that I maintained throughout the entire day what I intended to be a "dignified reserve," but what I half suspect bore stronger resemblance to a deep sulk. My station had its privileges, and I availed myself to the utmost of them. I dined alone. Yes, on that day I did fall back upon the eminence of my condition, and proudly remarked that I would fetch for myself. I was delighted to see the dismay this declaration caused. I could hear it speeding on with terror. I was looking at her through a chink in the door when Miss Herbert gave my message, and I thought she looked frightened.

"What were his precise words? Give them to me exactly as he uttered them," said she, tremulously; "for there are shades in the best intentions are half commands."

"I can scarcely remember them, Madam," said the other; "but their purport was, that we were not to expect him at dinner, that he had ordered to be served in his own room, and at his own hour."

At that this is very probably all over the world the old lady, with indignation. "Unaccustomed to any levity of conduct, brought up in a track where consistency and regularity reigned, he has been shocked by your conduct with this stranger. Yes, Miss Herbert, I say shocked, because, however you may underrate them, such freedoms are utterly unknown in—in certain circles."

"I am sure, Madam," replied she, with a certain amount of spirit, "that you are laboring under a very unjust misconception. There was no familiarity, no freedom. We talked as I imagine people usually talk when they sit at the same table d'hôte. Monsieur has my name—"

"Nor is it necessary, Miss Herbert," said the old woman, tartly; "though, if you had, probably this unfortunate incident might not have occurred. And now, Madam," turning and writing a few lines in my name, hoping that his indisposition may be very slight, and begging to know if he desires any assistance. Sorrowful and take some repose."

I waited till I saw Miss Herbert open her writing-desk, and then I hastened off to my room to reflect over my answer to her note. Now that the apology was made to me, I was pleased with the notion of passing an entire day where we were. The place was Schaffhausen, the famous Falls of the Rhine, and as I was much in a cataract, but picturesque withal; pleasant chestnut woods to ramble about, and a nice old inn in a wild old wilderness of a garden that sloped down to the very river.

Strange perversity is it not? but how naturally one likes every thing to have some feature or other out of keeping with its intrinsic purport. An inn like an old château, a chief justice that could ride a steeple-chase, a bishop that sings Moore's Melodies, have an immense attraction for me. They startle us, then, to say truth

"Don't fancy life is a mere four-roomed house with a door in the middle. Don't imagine that all is humdrum, and routine, and regular. Notwithstanding his wig and stern black eyebrows, there is a touch of romance in that old chancellor, and trust that you couldn't beat out of it with his great mace; and his grace the primate of all Ireland has not forgotten what made the poetry of his life in days before he ever dreamed of clerges or triennial visitations."

By these reflections I mean to convey that I am very fond of an inn that does not look like an inn, but resembles a faded old country-house, or a deserted convent, or a disabled mill. This Schaffhausen Gasthaus looked like all three. It was a heap of place one might come to in a long vacation, to live simply and go early to bed, taking monotony as a tonic, and fancying unbroken quiet was a better than pleasure.

"Ah!" thought I, "if it had not been for that confounded German, what a paradise might not this have been!" Down there in that garden, with the din of the waterfall around me, watching under the beautiful chestnuts the gay way through tangled sweet-briers, and arbutus and laburnum, what delicious nonsense might I not have written! How easy! Ay! and not unwillingly had she heard it. That something within that never deceives, that little crimson blush that betrays the unconscious feels me that she liked me, that she was attracted by what, if it were not flattery, I would call the irresistible attractions of my nature; and now this creature of bruises and beer-root had spoiled all, jarring every chord that might have vibrated with pleasure, and make yielded me such sweet music."

In thinking over the inadequacy of all human intelligence, I had forgot the main struck by the fact, that, while the law gives the weak man a certain protection against the strong, against the physical strength of the powerful ruffian in the street, it affords none against the assaults of the intellectual bully or tyrant. They may maltreat you at his pleasure, batter you with his arguments, kick you with inferences, and bruise you with contradictions, and no help for it all!

Then, here comes François with the note. I wrote one line in pencil for answer: I am sensibly touched by your consideration, and will put myself under it. I signed this with a D., which might mean Prince, Potts, or Pottinger. My reply dispatched, I began to think how I could commence my dinner. "I will bring her to book," thought I; "I will have an explanation."

I always have a touch of thing—there is an almost certainty of emotion; now emotion begets tears; tears, tenderness; tenderness, confidence; confidence, mutual consolation; you are, so to say, a tenant in possession; your title may be disputable, your lease invalid, still you are there, and you remain, and it will take time at least to turn you out." After all," thought I, "that rude German has but troubled the water for a moment, the pure well of her affections will by this time have regained its calm, still surface, and I shall see my image there as before."

My meditations were interrupted, perhaps not unhappily, by the entrance of the waiter with my dinner. I am not unsocial—I am eminently the reverse—I may say, like most men who feel themselves thoroughly gifted, I like company, I feel that my gifts have in such gatherings their fullest exercise, although I will say, with all this, I have always felt that to dine splendidly, all alone, was a very grand thing. Mind, I don't say that I like to dine jolly, or social; simply that it is grand to see all that table equipage of crystal and silver spread out for you before you, and the whole business of that gorgeous candelabrum is to light you; that the two decorous waiters in black—archdeacons they might be, from the quiet dignity of their manners—are there to wait upon you; that the whole sacrifice, from the turtle to the cheese, was a homemade to your greatness. I repeat, these are all grand and imposing considerations, and there have been times—there was one, indeed, these Lucullus of Lucullo festivals more than convivial assemblages. Those were days when I was honored over my dinner in delightful dalliance. I partook of nearly every dish, but, with a supreme reminiscence of say, as though to imply, "I am accustomed to a very different cuisine from this; it is not thus that I fare habitually." And yet I liked enjoying, accepting and even such humble efforts to please as if they had been necessary. The dinner was good, and I drank no other wine, though various flasks with tempting titles stood around me.

Dinner concluded coffee served, I asked the waiter what resources the place possessed in the way of amusement. He looked blank and even distressed at the question; he had all his life imagined that the Falls sufficed for every thing; he had seen them from his infancy, and was tired of them for years. Since he was a boy, he had never ceased to witness the yearly recurring round of visitors who came, and stared, and wrote, and scribble about them, and so he faintly muttered out a remonstrance.

"Monsieur has not yet visited the Falls."

"The Falls! why I see them from this, and if I pass the window I am stunned with their uproar."

I was really sorry at the pain my hasty speech gave him; he looked as if he suddenly faint and ill, and after a moment gasped out,

"But Monsieur is surely not going away without a visit to the cataract? the guide-books give two hours as the very shortest time to see them effectually."

He staggered, and had to hold a chair to support himself:

"There is, besides, the Laufen Schloss—

"As to castles," broke I in, "I have no need to leave my own to see all that medieval architecture can boast. No, no," sighed I out, "if I am to have new sensations they must come through some other channel than sight. Have you no theatre?"

"No, Sir. None."

"No concert-rooms, no music garden?"

"None, Sir."

"Not even a circus?" said I, peevishly.

"There was, Sir, but it was not attended. The strangers all come to see the Falls."

"Confound the Falls!" cried I, in the hearing of the circus?"

"Well, they made a bad business of it; got into debt on all sides for oil, and forage, and printing placards, and so on, and then they beat a sudden retreat one night, and slipped off, all but two, and indeed they were about the best of the company, but somehow they lost their heads in the flurry, and instead of coming up with their companions, found themselves at daybreak at the outside of the town."

"And these two unlucky ones, what were they?"

"One was the chief clown, Sir, a German, and the other was a little girl, a Moor they called her; but the cleverest creature to ride or throw somersaults through hoops of the whole of them."

"And how do they live now?"

"Very hardly, I believe, Sir; and but for Tintenfleck—that's what they call her—they might starve altogether. She's always with her guitar through the cafés of an evening, and as she has a sweet voice, she picks up a few batzen. But the season, I hear, was bad this year no longer, and says that, as they have no passport or papers of any kind, they must be sent over the frontiers into Switzerland."

"Let that matter be brought before me," said I, with a burst of indignation. "Let me see him in a few brief words what I think of his heartless cruelty— But no, I was forgetting—

"I am not at home. Be careful, my good man, that you do not mention what I have so inadvertently dropped; remember that I am nobody here; I am neither Five, nor seven, nor more. Send the unfortunate creatures, however, here, and let me examine them. They can be easily found, I suppose?"

"In a moment, Sir. They were in the Plats just when I left the house."

"What name does the man bear?"

"I never heard a name for him. Among the company he was called Vaterchen, as he was the oldest of them all; and, indeed, they seemed all very fond of him."

"Let Vaterchen and Tintenfleck, then, come hither. And bring fresh glasses, waiter."

And I poured as might an Emperor at my ease, giving his orders for a "nautch;" and then, waving my hand, motioned the messenger away.

FASHIONS FOR THE SEASON.

THE Paris fashions for the present season contain many novelties. Our illustration, on the following page, gives two of the new styles of the Lodi, and the Chumbery; also a new evening dress.

NEW CLOAKS.

The Lodi Cloak is of velvet, without any other trimming than a narrow ruching placed upon the interior edge. The sleeve, in two pieces, forms two points; the back bottom one is laid and sealloped. The Chumbery Cloak, very simple in its form, is composed of a light-colored cloth bordered with a silk binding; a double shoulder-stripe and a passementerie. The mantean Chambery fastens in front by means of three large buttons.

AN EVENING DRESS.

A new Dress for an Evening Party is a robe of pink gaze de Chambery, with five goffered flounces, which are placed round the skirt. Above, a manteau as that the ends of three of them are brought up on one side of the skirt, where they terminate graduating; as shown in our illustration. These three pieces of flouncing finish with a large simple box-plaiting of gaze. The corsage is round, with a plaited front, the sleeves (of tulle) having three rows of narrow goffering descending from the base of the shoulder. To the back of the waist is attached a bow, from which depend two streamers of silk ribbon of the same color as the dress. The head-dress consists of a garland composed of tufts of flowers of different hues, the back hair being fastened by a gilt band.

JETONS.

Among other changes this season we may allude to the new skirts. Among the numerous descriptions of jupons, of tarlatan or of dark color, striped or plain, the most recently introduced is the Coqe Engire, as it is called, the only one now accepted in the matter of skirts. It is in fact a new style full as the requirements of the mode of stiff petticoats, without imparting to them the appearance of exaggerated extension. It is light, supple, and very agreeable to the wearer, fitting gracefully to the waist.

BONNETS.

A decided modification has taken place in the form of bonnets this autumn. The front edge recedes farther on the forehead, and falls back rather rapidly on reaching the side. The shape of the curtain is peculiar, being very deep, more graceful, and without proportionate. The entire bonnet is rarely composed exclusively of velvet, crape, etc.; blonde, silk, and lace are mixed up more than ever with the material.

HEAD-DRESSES.

Without entering into details, we may allude to the increased varieties of garland head-dresses, composed of puffs, lace, and flowers, the effect of which is in keeping with the extravagant exigencies of the toilet of the present day.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR DECEMBER, 1860.—[SEE PAGE 779.]

THE INQUISITION AT ROME.

WE publish herewith, from plans taken by a Roman architect during the Roman Republic of 1849, an accurate plan of the Roman Inquisition Building. It serves to explain the apartments on the ground-floor, the subterranean, and the first floor above the ground. The Roman numerals mark the ground-floor, the small letters the subterranean, and the Roman capitals the first floor. The following is the key to the plan:

GROUND-FLOOR.

I. Principal entrance.
II. Vestibule.
III. Guard-room.
IV. Ante-chamber.
V. Main staircase, which leads to the upper stories.
VI. Large court, with
1. A portico all around it, leading to the chambers of the officers.
VII., VIII., IX., X. Small rooms, very feebly lighted, for the imprisonment of doubtful persons arrested.
XI., XII. Writing-rooms.
XIII. Large court of the prisons, around which are
2. Remains and traces of an old three-sided portico, which was demolished by order of the Triumvirate.
XV. Keeper's room.
XV. Other rooms, with
3. A hole dug in the pavement, from which a vaulted subterranean passage leads to the spacious and dark subterranean chamber marked d, d, d, d, d, d.
4. Demolished walls, the rubbish of which exposed to view a secret pit, like a well, descending from the floor above the basement floor down below the bottom of the lowest subterranean of this horrible, horrible edifice. In the first days of May, 1849, men were digging out the putrified bones of unknown victims who had been mysteriously martyred there, some of which appeared to be of recent date.
5. A secret door, which appeared like a book-case, indicating a former passage for communication with No. XVII.
XVI. Great hall of the prison and torture-chamber, with a block of marble and other stones, hollowed with skill, on which, it appeared, they had placed the feet or arms of prisoners. There were large iron rings fixed in the walls.
6. A niche, in which was placed the image of an idol, with arms movable at the joints by means of a secret and powerful mechanism, with which, it appeared, they had tortured their innocent victims.
7. Aperture in the wall, recently broken through, to reach No. XVII., instead of the door, 5, near the excavation, which rendered it useless, being so near it.
XVII. Atrio, or landing-place, and secret staircase leading to the first and second stories above the basement.
18. Human bones, scattered and in heaps, some of them of recent date.
XVIII. Chamber of rigorous inquisition.
XIX. Prisons of convalescence.
9. Entrance of a pistoll, which ends in the subterranean prison below (marked 15).
10. Entrance of a staircase, shut in dark, with a heavy wooden covering strengthened with iron.

THE SUBTERRANDAN.

a. A dark prison, with two large iron rings fixed in the red and infected walls.
b. Prisons, with very feeble light, admitted through a small subterranean window (marked 11), with iron rings like the preceding. Here was found the mouth of a deep hole, like a well.
11. A very small window, or loop-hole, furnished with large gratings, formed to give light to the underground court.
c. 12. Another prison, with a little window which nobilized only a very little light. In the part within the demolished aperture before existing in the fetid pavement, was a staircase of decayed wood, leading down to a deep vault, which nobody was able to examine, both because of the unsafe condition of the steps, the horrid appearance of the hole, and the nephytic smell which proceeded from it.—the stench of decaying corpses.
13. Enlargement of an opening, like the mouth of an oven, which had formerly existed there, from which workmen were taking out dry bones from a heap of skeletons. The hole appeared to have a communication with another, judging from indications in a wall more recently erected.
d, d, d. Part of the subterranean, more elevated than those marked c, c.
e, e, e. Another part, deeper than d, d, d, having remains of unburied corpses scattered about here and there.
14. An accidental fissure in the broken wall, serving as a mysterious communication with the pit under trap-door—No. 15.

FIRST STORY.

A. Chamber of residence of the First Familiar of the Inquisition.
15. A fantastic door-way, communicating with apartment B.
B. The floor of this passage covered a pendulous shutter, and gave way at the slightest pressure. This is the tremendous TRAP-DOOR OF THE INQUISITION, or Trappoherette del Santo Uffizio. It is constructed with such skill and precision that, on closing it, there is not the slightest sign of sinister suspicion. From the top to the bottom of the hole there are large stones projecting from the sides, which even now are stained with blood, and some of them locks of hair, from persons martyred in that pit. In the bottom was found the skull of a young lady, of a recent date, from which many of the victims evinced sway locks of her long brown hair.
B. Chamber of the Second Familiar Inquisitor.

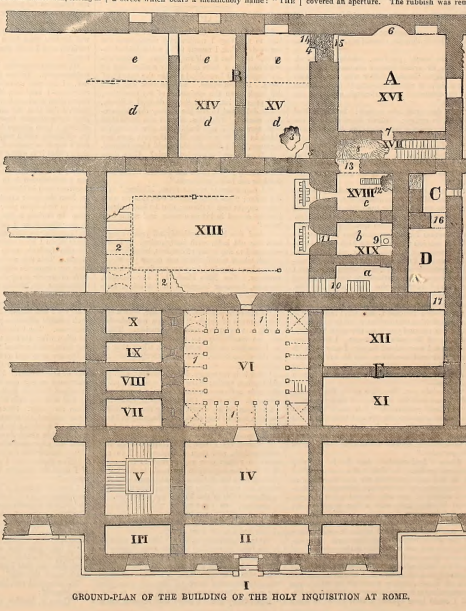
Above these two chambers, A and B, and in continuation, are found a number of very small and dark prisons, on the walls of which were written thousands and thousands of imprecations and manifestoes, the curses of innocent victims of the rage and lust of the "man in purple."
C. Apparently a dark, feebly lighted, vaulted space, where perceptible traces of ignominious punishments and infernal cruelty. There was found a human hand, of which only the bones remained, with the joints pierced through with a large and driven into a wooden bench.
D. Another small prison, without any light, the use of which could not be conjectured, and which perhaps served only as a passage from room E, through the small door 17.
E. A large supplementary apartment.

N.B.—What I have described above I saw and verified with my own eyes in the first days of May, 1849, at that epoch when Mazzini, then a Triumvir, decreed that that infernal edifice should be destroyed to its foundation.



Many of our readers will remember that letters were published, in 1849, by different persons who had visited the Roman Inquisition, or Holy Office, in American newspapers, some of which were copied from English or French gazettes, and that they corresponded, in many essential particulars, with the preceding description. This concurrent testimony would be found to be very impressive and convincing, if we had room to lay it all at once before our readers. We can, however, find room only for some extracts from a very full and authentic description, given by one of the best and most respected writers of our day, Signor F. De Boni, who paid long and repeated visits to the edifice, and published a formal account of what he saw in that intergating Italian magazine, Italia del Popolo. We copy from the translation made for "The Roman Republic of 1849, by Theodore Dwight."

Near the Vatican Square, between the Church of St. Peter and the Castle of Sant' Angelo, extends a street which bears a melancholy name: "THE STREET OF THE INQUISITION." There the tribunal resides which makes the altar a stepping-stone to the prison. In that street multitudes of persons crowded in March and April, 1849, and passed through the spacious edifice to which it leads, uttering imprecations and maledictions as they returned, then silently dispersed to their homes, with indignation, fear, and horror contending in their breasts.

On the 4th of April, 1849, the Government of the Republic, moved by a sentiment of justice and Christian compassion, having established, on the ruins of papal tyranny, the legitimate reign of brotherly equality, decreed that the houses of the Holy Office should become the habitations of poor families, who had only miserable dwellings, in unhealthy and confined quarters of Rome. They intended thus to cancel, on a republican plan, the remains of ancient tyranny, by consecrating to beneficence what papal majesty had devoted to torture. Consequently the Holy Office, which for three centuries had been closed, except to victims of suspicion and the martyrs of liberty and conscience, whom it buried in prisons or gave to the flames, was thrown open to the people. The people can reason clearly; and in those religious prisons they better understood the necessity of rejecting the shepherd who bears a sword instead of a crook, and more admired and loved the gentle doctrine of the Nazarene, while shuddering at the tortures inflicted in his name.

And what awful scenes did history bring to mind to those who passed through those dismal halls! From this place, so near the Vatican, issued the orders for the slaughter of the Jews and the last Mussulmans in Spain. Within this building was decreed the murder of the Waldenses in the Guardia of Lombardy and the subalpine valleys. Here Galileo was tortured, the imprisonment of Gianone was ordered, Pasquale was condemned to the flames, as well as Carnesecchi, Palmario, and Giordano Bruno. Here were planned the murder of the Huguenots and the horrors of Flanders. Here the censorship was organized, war was made against the printing-press, a holy act was pronounced treason, and attempts were made to chain the mind. But that Prometheus has broken its bonds, and the world is going on under its influence.

The edifice of the "Holy" Inquisition was in part erected about the middle of the 16th century. It may be divided into three parts, having the form of two rectangular buildings and a trapezium united. It is presumed by some that the edifice rests its walls upon a prison of Nero. In March, 1849, the Government of the Republic ordered accommodations for stables for the national artillery, and appropriated a part of the Inquisition, under the closed gallery of the second court. A space was opened in the walls; when the workmen discovered an aperture. The rubbish was removed, they descended into a small subterranean place, damp, without light or passage out, with no floor but a black, oleaginous earth resembling that of a cemetery. Here and there were scattered about pieces of garments of ancient fashions—the clothes of unfortunate persons who had been thrown down from above, and died of wounds, fear, or hunger. A baiocco (or penny) of Pius IX. was picked up, which probably denotes the epoch when that abode of darkness and despair was walled up. The rich soil had hardly begun to be removed before human bones were uncovered in some places, with some very long locks of hair, which doubtless had ornamented the heads of females. It is certain that the "Trap-door" swallowed victims of whom it was important to the "Holy" office to destroy all traces, because the Foro, or Judgment Hall, is over it in the second story of the first edifice.

The other modern prisons are contiguous to the last court, which has been converted into a garden. Each of those prisons is a very small cell, capable of containing only a single person, being in two stories, and all alike. They are accessible from an exceedingly narrow corridor, like the cells of a convent. The walls of this passage are every where covered with pictures, and inscriptions commenting upon them, which intimate the horrid nature of the institution, and hold up to view the severest dogmas of the Roman Catholic religion, not interpreted in a spirit of forgiveness. Yet the most tremendous inscriptions were erased before the flight of the pope. The cells were furnished with beds; and there the greatest disorder and filth every where prevailed. Here and there were worn-out cushions, coverlets, chairs, and tables, and old clothes of prisoners who died in the cells many years ago. In a certain very small cell were things which indicated horrible secrets; a piece of a woman's handkerchief, of large size, and an old bonnet, of a girl about ten years old. Poor little child! What offense, perhaps unknown to you, could it have been, which threw you into this place, and destroyed the innocent peace of your infantile years; which taught you to weep in the season of smiles, and perhaps deprived you of your dear and early life? In another cell were found four sandals, and several nuns' cords, a little spindle, caskets containing needles, crucifixes, and unfinished stockings, with the knitting-needles still well-pointed, and an infant's couch.

And so, in almost every one of the prison-rooms, were to be seen clothes, ornaments, and other relics of their former occupants; and, as every thing was wrapped in deep and mournful mystery, the imaginations of the people recalled ancient tragical stories, and wept over the misfortunes of persons of whose names they were ignorant.

THE PORT OF GAETA.

WE continue our series of Italian illustrations with a fine VIEW OF GAETA. At this point now centres the Neapolitan drama.

Gaeta is a small town, of great antiquity, in the Terra di Lavoro, in the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies. It was a pleasant resort of Romans in the olden time; Cicero had a villa near there, and it was within hail of the heights that he was assassinated. In modern times Gaeta has been a place of some trade, and a military stronghold of some importance. The harbor is excellent, and affords safe anchorage for a large number of ships; the fishing in the neighborhood is good, and some 3000 people, exclusive of soldiery, make a living at this and other trades. Gaeta imports some foreign goods for the consumption of the people of the Terra di Lavoro, and exports fish, dyes, silk, sulphur, etc. There are of course a number of churches at Gaeta; it is an archiepiscopal seat.

Partly in consequence of the strength of its fortifications, and partly because it is a convenient place to run away from, Gaeta has often been selected as a last refuge by Italian fugitives. Some of the hunted Italian noblemen sought refuge there from the French in 1806. In 1849, Pope Pius the Ninth, driven from Rome by the Republicans, fled to Gaeta, and held Court there until the French reconquered the Eternal City for him. And now, King Francis of Naples is at Gaeta, patiently awaiting his final expulsion from Italy by the forces of Victor Emanuel. A historic site, surely!

UP A STEP-LADDER.

LITTLE WILLIE had not appeared at my door for full a month; I missed his cheerful whistle as he came, day by day, tugging up the rough road with the heavy bread-basket at his back, and saw that he had been superseded by another boy much smaller and of preternaturally grave countenance. I waylaid this boy one afternoon as he was toiling up the hill, and inquired what had become of Willie. He said he didn't know. Had he got a better place? He didn't know. Was he gone to school? He didn't know. Was he poorly? He didn't know. In fact, he knew nothing, so I gave him a half-penny for his information and let him struggle on, wondering how in the world he did it.

Willie did not belong to my class at school, but his two big brothers did, and when I saw them the next Sunday, I renewed my inquiries for my merry little friend, and was told that he had got the fever—the fever in our village meaning something generated of damp homes, bad drainage, insufficient water, and sometimes insufficient food.

"He has had it going on for a month," George told me. I asked if he had had it severely? "He's been very bad in his head, and he don't know none of us but mother. But it's his ears now," was the rather mysterious answer.

I always had a reluctance, difficult to overcome, to go any where where I am not certain to be welcome. If I were ill, I should feel inexpressibly annoyed to have strangers coming about me with pudding and tarts; and what I am not like myself, I am chary of inflicting on other people.

VIEW OF THE CITY AND PORT OF GAETA, ITALY.

But I knew that our clergyman and his wife, whose kitchen is kitchen for all the sick poor in the parish, were away; I reflected that a laboring man with six children, even though two of them are big enough to support themselves, is not commonly provided with a surplus fund against rainy days; so I screwed up my courage, told my old servant to make a regulation pudding and put it in a basket with a few other little matters applicable to the case, and set off the next morning to look after Willie.

Down a step from the road, down a steep unpaved cart-way, past an immense mound of agricultural enrichment, down a sloppy foot-path between currant-bushes bearing innumerable small rags of clothing but no leaves, down a series of stepping-stones, and I am at the open door of Willie's home. Just inside are five small dots of children, four of them "playing at ladies," and the fifth, a curly-headed urchin of about three years old, enacting the part of audience at the comedy. One of the four, a blue-eyed maiden of six and a previous acquaintance of mine, immediately detaches herself from the rest of the group, advances, drops a bob courtesy, and then turns sharply round to her companions and asks where are their manners? Their manners are instantly made manifest by three more bob courtesies, but the curly head proves refractory, retires behind his largest little sister, and peeps at my basket round the corner of her elbow, while my blue-eyed damsel apologizes for him as being "only little Robert"—too young yet to have any manners.

And we all stand and stare at each other, the children quite at home under the circumstances, myself feeling awkward that I have not a second basket to give up to plunder by these infantry, until I am recalled to myself by hearing blue eyes communicate my name and place of abode to her next neighbor, when I ask if they know where Willie's mother is? Immediately they all shouts forth, "Mother's gone out ironing at Mrs. Dent's." I then ask, "Where is Willie?" to which they simultaneously reply, "He's up there in mother's bed;" and following the direction of their pointing fingers, I turn round and perceive an almost perpendicular step-ladder, the foot of which is directly opposite the door-way, and the head, without any circumlocution, in a loft. In which loft, when I look up, I can see hanging the identical best coat in which George has attended my class for two years past.

"Will you go up and see him?" asks blue eyes; and the biggest girl, who may be of the mature age of seven, darts forward to plot the way. But I am doubtful as to the step-ladder, and suggest the expediency of first "making" mother, "if she is to be got at; on which all the children except Robert execute manœuvres equal to a fiat of blighted cabbages, and disappear round a corner, while he and I improve our acquaintance by continuing to stare at each other. In a few minutes the quartette returns as they went, followed by "mother," who stops ten yards off and makes a bob courtesy of the same pattern (I detect this courtesying, but she doesn't say "Don't courtesy to me"), and then approaches, looking at the step-ladder as much as to see me, though I never saw her in my life before.

She is a pretty woman, of not more than two or three and thirty, with beautiful eyes, delicate features, and dark hair; all her clothing is clean and whole and decent; and when Robert butts at her with his head, and he is taken up, kissed, and cashiered with two of the girls, who are his sisters, into the house-place, while she gives me her account of Willie, standing in the door-way.

"He ought to have been in his bed a fortnight before he was, the doctor says," she tells me, "but he is on the mend now, but very weak, and will I go up and see him?

It is my destiny to mount that step-ladder. So up the step-ladder into a loft with a pallet-bed in it, and a thinly covered mattress in one corner on the floor; furniture, discovery without delay, there is a room about twelve feet square, in which, on "mother's" bed, lyeth Willie, aged William Wilkes.

He is wide awake, and watching a casual gleam of sunshine that has found its way through the rainy clouds, and strayed in at the low window; but as I go up to his pillow he turns on me a pair of wonderful eyes, and says, faintly, "A little better." I am before explains that he thinks I asked him how he did. His hearing is quite gone, and I cannot make a word reach him, except that this arises from weakness, and will pass away as he gets his strength again. "You think it will, ma'am?" he says, and looks at him very wistfully: on which, supposing himself addressed, Willie says again, "A little better," and, a minute after, "I drink, mother."

She says she will go and warm him a drop of milk, and disappears, taking me together. "He always turns his eyes slowly from the sunshine to my face, and from my face to the sunshine. I look at him and at the place where he lies, and meditate on the mysterious inequalities there are in the world, and on the hard lives of the working poor.

The room is as pure as scrubbing and whitewash can make it; every thing about the bed is scrupulously clean; the old chest of drawers is covered on the top with a white cloth; as is also a rough deal box by the wall, which serves as a table, and on which stands the bottle of physic and stuff, with a glass and spoon disposed ornamentally in connection with a copy of the British Workman, a teething biscuit, and a Bible. The walls, washed, fastened up with pins, are some rudely colored scripture prints, a few missionary pictures, and, in one corner above the head of another mattress on the floor, the Lord's Prayer in large type. In the window of the window are a few plants, fresh and green; and, though the room is low, it is not oppressively close, for there is a thorough current of air blowing up from the door-way below.

When mother returns with the warm milk he drinks it eagerly, and the pudding being extracted from the basket, he eats a portion of that, with an enjoyment I cannot to watch. When finished it, he stretches out his arm and looks up at his mother.

"He wants you to see how thin his arm is, ma'am," she explains; and rolling up his nightgown sleeve, shows me a weak, wilting wrist, skeleton limb which will carry no more breadbaskets for many a month to come.

She then sits down by his pillow, puts her arm round him, and makes him lean against her while she gives me the particulars of his illness; how good he was, how little hope there was for him at one time, but how the doctor says now he will come round, if she can get him to take a little strengthening food. The clergyman, she says, being away, she did not know whom to apply to. "I didn't think of you, ma'am, till George said that you'd been asking about Willie; I've spent many a six-pence for him, but I can't get what he likes; he takes eggs best, and he would eat them all day in a day, for he's getting hungry now, but he mustn't have them; I had him have one, but it was three ha'pence apiece." On my inquiring what the doctor recommends, she tells me a little broth or arrow-root—neither of stronger ye—which I volunteer to send her. It then occurs to me to ask if she is fond of poetry? "To which she says she believes not, if I don't stay there very long. But having fulfilled my present business, I think it will, perhaps, be expedient to go away; I therefore bid Willie good-by, with the foolish remark that I am sure he is grown, and that the fever will make a man of him, which, fortunately, he does not hear, and then I follow his mother into the outer loft, and down the step-ladder.

Next day, my old servant, who is interested in Willie as the only boy whom she never had to tell to shut the garden-door after him, makes a pudding of excellent broth, and leaves the meat in it, and when submitting it to my taste for approval, she assures me that if Willie's mother has any management about her she will freshen it every day, and it will keep and fit him for a week: which intimation she also conveys to George when he comes for it at his dinner-time. But when I go down, long before the week's end, to see the little fellow again, his mother tells me it lasted him only two days, for what was left after that turned sour.

I achieve the step-ladder again. Willie is still in bed, and still as deaf as a stone, and I think he looks a shade duller and more pallid than before; but there is sunshine in the room, and the sheet of the whitewashed wall to-day, and the drizzling rain slips mistily like a curtain over the glass. Still his mother says fondly, as she puts the scattered hair off his forehead, "He mends a little—yes, ma'am, I'm sure he mends a little;" and she adds, that the doctor says if he can get a little jelly broth made of cow-heel or calf's-feet, it would be better and more strengthening than any thing else. When I reply that I would order the butcher's wife to send her some feet she hesitates a moment, and then says, "I can clean them and prepare them myself, ma'am, if I get them just as they are; you will have to pay a shilling for the feet, but if you do not mind, I'll clean them, and do them, and they will cost half a crown."

When I return home I will yet provide the feet of her broth that was to last a week, on which she exclaims, "She has got no keeping place, I'll be bound; I'll not trust it." And to which I say I did she waste that good mutton too? Why, it would ha' been a dinner for all of 'em. What sort of a house is it? I reply that I fancy it have only seen the place into which the outer door opens, which is a sort of scullery where the washing-tub and the dirty plates stay in, and which had the bare ground for floor with a few pieces round them; and that I should like to know. I conjecture to be below the larger bedroom up the step-ladder. She replies that most likely that scullery is lacked with mud, for it is the way to inquire the next time I go; "for," adds she, "I can't abide waste, and if Willie's mother can't keep things as they should be, I'll have to look after 'em little by little every day as he wants 'em. I should like to see how she means to manage then calf's-feet."

A few days later I visit Willie again, and, waiting in the yard, am met by a neighbor, whom my servant's conjecture about this scullery being also a parlor to be correct, for, besides the pots and pans on the floor, there are a few plates and dishes on a shelf. Before my survey is completed, Willie's mother appears, and I am thereby relieved to my satisfaction I hear that he is down stairs for the first time to-day. I am accordingly ushered across the threshold, and find Willie, who says he is sitting on a stool within a deep chintz valance, which hangs where a mantle-piece is commonly found, for the chimney is a wide open space, and is no range, to oven, no boiler, nothing but a handful of fire on the hearth stones, kept in existence about by three bricks set one upon the other at each side, and about a foot apart. Fuel is very costly in our village, and the fire burns slowly; so Willie crouches down to it, looking much less comfortable than when he lay in his mother's bed; while opposite to him, and close to the door, is, further, a powerful mash in appearance, who, his wife says rightly, has only just been released from an all night leading coals up from the landing to the fire. Willie is no better of his deafness yet, but he is coming round. He is mainly interested in that coming round looks over that starved scrap of fire!

Like room has the same decided features of cleanliness under difficulties, of neatness, and attempt at ornament, as the rest of the premises. There is a rude deal table, home-made, and by no skilful carpenter, is the week's washing, ironed and folded. In the other corner is a shelf, with a few books, consisting chiefly of old brown books, contents unknown, but outwardly of a religious appearance, with a few plates to give room for a show of china. The floor is paved with worn, uneven stones set in the clay, the walls on the sunniest walls white-washed, and as I look out from the window into the dull day which has but just ceased raining, I see the dripping footpath inclining down to the road, the water draining off to settle in this moist corner.

I don't like to ask prying questions, but I should like to know who this cottage and what it costs the family a week. Whatever it costs in money, it costs them infinitely more in health and strength, and possibly in children's lives, before its owner will consent to pull it down and set for human beings to live in decently. But Willie's mother has no complaint to make—if she says a word, it is of somebody's kindness—as I suspect on grievance, as of "Mrs. Dent's" going away, leaving the father still fast asleep.

I have got over the awkwardness of feeling myself an intruder, and a few days later I am that way again; but the cabbage garden and the potato bed at the door are now dug over, and more with the dots of children enacting ladies. The outer door stands open, but the inner one is shut, and, while I stand knocking, I hear a childish wail of suffering than which I know no sound so sad: then the voice of our clergyman, who is home again, speaking to Willie's mother. As he comes out, I enter and see Willie, sitting on his stool rolled up in a blanket, with a cup of tea and the stones beside him, in which lies little Robert. Their mother's eyes are red weeping or watching, or both, but in answer to my inquiry, the little one is ill she only says, in her natural way, which is neither patient nor plaintive, but simply acquiescent in what is, as if she had no idea it either could be or ought to be otherwise, "Yes, ma'am, he's got the fever too; he began three days ago." And as the pitiful inarticulate wail continues, she lifts him to her arms and holds his curly head against her neck, and kisses him until it ceases; but he is very bad in his head, and the fever runs high, to very different expression from what they had when he peeped round his sister's elbow at my basket.

"I don't get much rest with him at nights," his mother tells me, and puts a chair for me to sit down, and sits down herself, nursing him in her lap, where he lies quiet enough. I then ask him me about him, and what the doctor says. "And don't I see Willie getting on?" He has been out a minute or two in the sun, but he could not stand by himself, and his boots are too heavy for his little thin feet. So I suggest a supernatural pair for my own, which she says she will be very glad of; and she defers to me and consults me, and I know nothing, and think that I am nothing, besides her, except that all my speculations and stories of struggle and suffering are mere shreds and patches of phantasm compared with her bare and bitter experience of life.

The two little girls are silently busy at the table, ironing. Instead of their if they often have their fingers—an idea which they repudiate with emphatic head-shakings. "It is their doll's clothes, ma'am; it keeps them quiet and makes them handy," their mother tells me; on which they smile, and display some wonderful bits of rag, the property of a much-abused but probably much-cherished wooden image now sitting unclothed on the top of the pile of books in the window sill. The fire is a little brighter to-day—perhaps the clergyman brightened it—and Willie has not been quite such a wan-eyed wee-look on his white face. He watches his mother and myself as we talk, which he cannot hear of course, and as he can not hear a word, he can raise his mind, apparently, to guess about what is going on; and to look on as the best and merry thing; perhaps his daily mess may be almost a blessing for a little while, for it will prevent him from being further worn down by the pressure of his pitiful wild.

This is not poverty under its worst aspect; it is very very hard and cruel. There is no drunken husband or lazy wife to waste the earnings of labor; there is industry, thrift, cleanliness: a successful struggle for food, blanket, pious, decent, orderly, under very hard conditions. There is no special want; there are regular wages, and not bad wages; there is fair fighting against misery by day; there are two boys at constant work, and a good mother to look after them. All seems to them a good home; yet all the possibilities of health, and natural growth, and everyday comfort, are defeated in a dwelling which the most ordinary care can never render what a dwelling of human beings ought to be.

Of the sanitary elements for Central Africa, could any fund be raised to enable penurious or indigent landlords to put kitchen ranges in the kitchens of their laboring tenants, and to bribe them to pull down their pest-houses, and erect dwellings in which fever and ague would be starved for want of food and strength, and always getting the victory?

Concentrated Leaven

For making

Bread, Tea Cakes,

All Kinds of Pastry, &c.,

MANUFACTURED BY

EDW. CHAMBERLIN & CO.,

Proprietors of Shawmut Chemical Works,

NO. 33 INDIA ST., BOSTON.

Concentrated Leaven

Is the result of careful chemical research. Bread of all kinds, made by using it, is light, more digestible and nutritious, has an agreeable natural taste, is less liable to sour, will retain its moisture longer than by any other process, and the whole preparation for the oven need not exceed ten minutes.

It is not perishable, and is available in places and at times when yeast is not to be within reach, as at sea. In all climates, and under all circumstances, it may be adopted, thus obviating all difficulty of procuring yeast or other ferment which is frequently of an inferior quality, rendering the bread more or less unwholesome.

It is valuable as regards economy, as a saving is effected in the flour of not less than 10 per cent. In the common process, much of the saccharine of the flour is lost by being converted into carbonic acid gas, and the waste is incurred solely for the purpose of generating gas to raise the dough. By using CONCENTRATED LEAVEN this waste is avoided, and the gas obtained in a manner equally effective, from the saccharine part of the flour or meal; a barrel of flour, weighing 196 pounds, which ordinarily produces 280 pounds of bread, given by this process 290 pounds, thus securing a very important saving. By compound of ordinary materials any one can produce the same, and the result will invariably be highly satisfactory.

Certificate from Dr. Hayes,

ASSAYER TO THE STATE OF MASSACHUSETTS.

I have analyzed the Concentrated Leaven manufactured by Messrs. Edw. Chamberlin & Co., with reference to its purity and efficiency of action in producing the effect of yeast in distending, raising, and thereby rendering it fit for making bread. This article is skillfully compounded, from perfectly pure materials. It raises the dough without consuming the sugar or any other principle in the flour, perfectly; and the same weight of flour will produce more sweet, palatable bread than can be obtained through the aid of yeast, while economy in the process is invaluable, as it saves all risk and much time of the pastry cook. The experiments I have made, fully confirm the statements of the manufacturers, and prove this compound worthy of public approval and encouragement.

A. A. HAYES, State Assayer.

How to use it.

Breakfast and Tea Rolls.

Three teaspoonfuls of Leaven to one quart of flour; mix thoroughly by passing the dry or three times through a sieve; rub in a piece of butter of half the size of an egg, and make the paste with cold milk or water (cold is preferable here), by stiff enough to permit rolling out. Much kneading is not necessary. Cut like desired forms, and place immediately in a hot oven and bake quickly.

Loaf Bread.

The same proportions of Leaven and flour sifted together as above. Omit the butter, and make the paste thick enough to kneed into a loaf, and bake immediately in a slow oven.

Buckwheat Cakes.

Flour and milk sufficient to make one quart of batter; add one pint, then three teaspoonfuls of Leaven; beat to a froth and cook quick.

Sponge Cake.

Two cups of white sugar, beaten with the yolks of six eggs—the whites of six eggs beaten to a froth; then beat together; add one cup of sifted flour, one cup of cold water, and three teaspoonfuls of Leaven; flavor with two teaspoonfuls of essence of lemon, and bake in a quick oven.

Corn Cake.

One pint each of flour and Indian meal, and three teaspoonfuls of Leaven, well sifted together; add one gill of molasses and two eggs; mix thin with milk, and bake in a slow oven.

Cup Cake.

Five cups of flour and three teaspoonfuls of Leaven, sifted together; add one cup of butter, two of sugar, and two eggs all well beat together; mix with milk; then add a cup of currants, and spice to suit the taste.—Bake about half an hour.

Ladies' Cake.

Three-quarters of a pound of flour and four teaspoonfuls of Leaven, sifted together; one pound of sugar and six ounces of butter, beaten to a cream, the whites of eight eggs, well beaten, and the juice of one lemon, mixed with milk.

Webster Cake.

Five cups of flour, three teaspoonfuls of Leaven, three cups of sugar, one of butter, one of milk, and two eggs; fruit and spice to the taste. Bake about half an hour.

Muffins.

Three teaspoonfuls of Leaven, one quart of flour, and a little salt sifted together; make a thick batter with milk, and bake in rings.

Apple Pudding.

Pare and slice eight apples, sift three teaspoonfuls of Leaven with one quart of flour; put a piece of butter half the size of an egg; mix with cold water to a paste; roll out one inch thick, put the apple into the crust with a little cinnamon; put into a cloth, allowing room to swell one-third; boil one hour and a half.

Highland Cake.

Two teaspoonfuls of Leaven and one cup of flour sifted together; two cups well butter; two cups of milk; two cups of sugar and seven eggs; add flour enough to mix as stiff as common cup cake, and bake about half an hour.

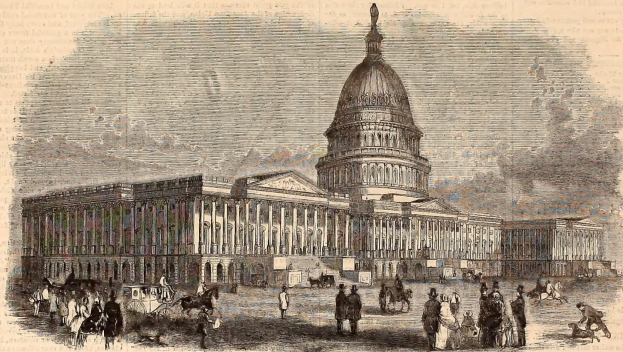
HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.



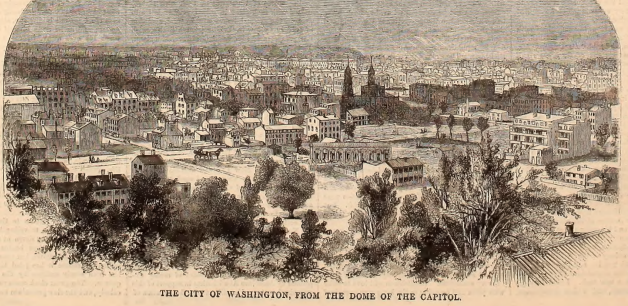
VOL. IV.—No. 207.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE CITY OF WASHINGTON AND THE CAPITOL.

In view of the momentous discussions which are now going on at the Federal Capital, we publish herewith a general View of Washington City, and a Picture of the Capitol.

The City of Washington stands at the head of tide-water on the River Potomac — 120 miles from the Ocean. It is 60 years old. When the Independence of the United States was established, New York was the Federal Capital. The subject of a permanent seat of Government engaged the early attention of Congress, and for some time a majority was in favor of a site on the Susquehanna. But after a time, the Southern members being unanimously for the border of the Potomac, and the Northern States deeming the location of the Federal seat of Government of less consequence than the assumption of the war debts of the States, it was agreed to accept the ten square miles of land now constituting the District of Columbia, and meanwhile the Government was transferred to Philadelphia. The corner-stone of the Capitol was laid by General Washington in 1793; the Government was removed to Washington in 1800.



THE NATIONAL CAPITOL AT WASHINGTON.

In those days it was a dreary place. Mrs. Adams wrote that she was obliged to have fires going all summer to keep off the chills; and some members of Congress were so disgusted with the spot that they were with difficulty persuaded to attend during the session. The environs have changed, too. In those days Georgetown carried on a brisk trade with London and Liverpool, and Blasdensburg was a considerable exporter of tobacco. Now neither place boasts much of its foreign trade. It is said that General Washington, whose plans for the embellishment of the Federal City time is slowly executing, really believed that it would not only be the noblest town on the Continent in respect of architectural glories, but that it would be the site of a large and increasing commerce — the sea-port of the nation. He did not share the fears which induced so many other statesmen to dread locating the Government in a commercial city. Time, however, and the energy of the people of Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, have prevented the accomplishment of this destiny. Washington is not, and never will be, a place of any trade. It is a political city. In many respects it is the pleasantest city in the United States. Society is more refined there than in New York, Boston, or Southern cities. All the intellect of the country, and not a little of the beauty and fashion, congregate there every winter. There are other topics of conversation in Washington than dollars and per centages; and with all the tedium and corruption of politics, a relief from the never-changing commercial tone of thought which pervades society in such cities as New York is always acceptable.

As a city, Washington is chiefly famous for its "distances." Miles in Washington are as acres in other cities. Every thing is at least half a league from every thing else; and the consumption of shoe-leather by those who can not hire vehicles is enormous. The idea of General Washington was that the Capitol should be the centre of the city, and that avenues should radiate from it at equidistant points. To complete his plan, Washington should have a million of inhabitants. It has nearly fifty thousand, and a couple of avenues are fairly populated, with a proportionate number of cross-streets. If the Union is preserved, and Washington remains the Capital, a hundred years hence the original scheme may be carried out. At present the view from the dome of the Capitol, as shown in our illustration, is very striking, and gives an exaggerated idea of the size of the city.

Of the Capitol, as we said, the corner-stone was laid on 18th Sept., 1793, by General George Washington: it has thus been 63 years in the course of construction, and is not yet complete. The first architect was Dr. Wm. Thornton; then followed Hadfield, Holmon, Latrobe, and Bulfinch, under the latter of whom the old Capitol was completed. In the last war with England the two wings were ruthlessly destroyed by the invaders. After the peace the work was resumed, and the old Capitol was completed in 1825. The length of this building was 352 feet 4 inches by 121 feet deep. Since then the present extensions, north and south, have been added, and the total length of the building is now 745 feet eight inches. The corner-stone of the south extension was laid by President Fillmore on 4th July, 1851, and an eloquent oration was delivered on the occasion by Daniel Webster. With these extensions the Capitol is one of the noblest and most commodious public edifices in the world. We published a view of it, together with an account of some of the interior work of the extensions, in No. 88 of this Journal. It contains a number of excellent pictures, illustrative of the past history of the country, by Trumbull and other artists; also some beautiful statuary by Crawford and others; but still the work of decoration may be said to be hardly begun. Most of the niches for statues and the spaces for paintings are still vacant. If the Union can be preserved, and the country continue as prosperous as it is, in the course of a generation the Capitol will be, in an artistic point of view, as worthy of the country as it is now in respect of size and architectural perfection.

DISUNION CAUSED BY THE BRITISH ARISTOCRACY.

WE present the following extract from our readers without comment. The writer is known as a gentleman of intelligence and integrity.

A VIEW BEHIND THE CURTAIN.

In the fall of 1833 the writer met in Paris the late MR. AARON LEGGETT, formerly a wealthy merchant in this city, and a member of the Society of Friends. We conversed frequently on the political prospects of our country as affected by the agitation of the Slavery question. MR. L. said that, when he was a young man, he was an active and zealous member of a Manumission Society, and that he continued to cherish in after life a very compassionate feeling for the poor negroes. At the time of the general emancipation of the slaves in the British West Indies MR. Leggett's business called him to the city of Mexico, and while residing there he met Deputy Commissary-General Wilson, of the British Army, an agent appointed by the British Government to make the financial arrangements connected with the payment to the West India shareholders of their portion of the £20,000,000 voted by the British Parliament as a compensation for the forced sacrifice of their property.

MR. Leggett, at that time, when he learned MR. WILSON'S errand, he took occasion, while he was sitting with him one day after dinner, to express his admiration of the British Government and the British people, for that noble act, the vote of £20,000,000 sterling, to procure liberty for 800,000 negroes! MR. Wilson fell ultimate into his feelings and almost exhausted the vocabulary of eulogy to find the commendatory epithets which he applied to England and Englishmen.

"MR. Wilson did not seem to sympathize with me," said MR. L., "and when I had finished, he simply turned to me, and said, 'Do you think, MR. Leggett, that this emancipation of the negroes will prove to be a wise measure?'

"Certainly, I replied," said MR. L. "How can it be otherwise?"

"The cool heads in England," said MR. Wilson, "do not think that it will be beneficial in its effects on the interests of the people either in the colonies or in the mother country. Nor do I think so. We think that the freed negroes will do very little work; and that the West India colonies, as the chief source of wealth to the mother country, will be ruined.'

MR. Leggett had been carried away with the representations of the enthusiastic friends of emancipation—that free labor was more productive than slave labor—that when the negroes were free they would receive wages, and that this would stimulate them to raise sugar and coffee in greater quantities; that consequence would feel the benefit of the new impulse to agriculture; that lands would rise in value; that the income of the planters would be increased, etc.; and his ardor was at first cooled by MR. Wilson's gloomy view of the case.

"After a little reflection, however," said MR. L., "I continued my eulogy of the British Government and the British people; and I went now further than before in the expression of my admiration, but I went on a new tack. I said that the enemies of Englishmen, and of their government, were accustomed to represent them as always governed by mercenary considerations, and too willing to sacrifice justice, humanity, and all the virtues, to the lust of gain; but here was a case in which the coal heads that directed the action of the Government deliberately burdened itself cruelly with an immense debt, not to open new fields of wealth, but in full prospect of destroying the commercial value of their West India colonies, and of impoverishing the people there, and the proprietors in England—and all from a humane feeling, and a high train of justice—a high sense of what is due to poor, helpless, down-trodden negro slaves. It was the noblest act recorded in history! I knew of no parallel to it any where."

"When I had finished," added MR. L., "MR. W. again turned to me, and said, 'MR. Leggett, do you really believe that the men who control the action of the British government were led by such motives as you ascribe to them, to sacrifice certain interests to the public good?'

"I replied," said MR. L., "that if the men who control the action of the British governments really believed that the abolition of slavery in the British West Indies would result in the commercial ruin of the islands, I could not conceive of any other motive for their conduct than the noble one which I had assigned."

"Well, MR. Leggett,' said MR. W., 'you may believe this, but I do not. I believe that the action of the British government is dictated, so far as possible, the INTERESTS of the English Aristocracy.'

MR. L. then asked, "What interest of the English Aristocracy will be promoted by the ruin of the British West India Islands?"

MR. Wilson said that the abolition of slavery in the British colonies would naturally create an antiMissionist anti-slavery sentiment in England and America, and that in America this would in process of time excite a hostility between the Slave States and the slave States, which would end in a dissolution of the American Union, and the consequent failure of the great experiment of democratic government; and that the ruin of Democracy in America would be the supremest calamity to the English,—I do not understand, to give the language of MR. Leggett, but the following paragraphs convey, in my own language, the impression made upon my mind of the course of reasoning by which MR. W. came to his conclusion.

"The English Aristocracy have ruled England for ages. Their position is more enviable than that of any similar class in any other country on the globe. They rule the wealthiest empire in the world. Their landed estates enclosure a large portion of all the lands in the United Kingdom. Their estates are entailed in their families. The House of Lords is composed exclusively of the Aristocracy, and they have such influence in the elections that the members of the House of Commons are to a great extent the near relations of the Lords. The debris of honor and power, and sinecure offices wish large incomes, in the Church, the Army, the Navy, the Colonies, at Foreign courts, and in the Departments of Home government, are in their gift, and seem to be all filled with members of their own relatives and friends. They have inherited these privileges from their ancestors, and their great aim, their ruling desire, is to transmit them to their families, and to transmit them to their posterity. Their control of the public press, and of all the fountains of popular opinion and sentiment, has hitherto enabled them to impress the minds of the great body of the middle classes with the belief that the English Aristocracy, with its powers and privileges, is essential to the prosperity and glory of the English nation.

"Recently, however, this belief has been seriously shaken by the success of democratic institutions in America. English statesmen cannot but be well acquainted with America; and they see there a people of the same origin themselves, speaking the same language, reading the same books, holding the same religious opinions, living the same general habits of life, enjoying in every respect except that they have no aristocracy; and yet, under their democratic institutions, Americans are advancing every where, and rising in intelligence, in commerce and the arts, in the diffusion of education among the people, in population, wealth, and all the elements of national greatness and intelligent men of the middle classes in England are beginning to inquire why the contrast with its heavy taxation for the support of sinecure office, may not be as essential as they have heretofore supposed to the prosperity of England; and that the English people would perhaps make more rapid progress if they should throw off its burden, by republicanizing or Americanizing their institutions. The great danger to the English Aristocracy lies in the fact that the minds of the English people; for, if it should take root and spread, it might end in a revolution in which they would lose all their privileges. The great point of controlling in America and in England with the deepest interest in its bearings on this matter.

"The English Aristocracy see that the English people are a liberty-loving, a liberty-vaunting people. They see with what ease numerously-signed petitions for the Abolition of Slavery could be obtained in districts, and among classes, where there was no motive to excite any other than a humane feeling. They know that they could have found no difficulty in obtaining of such petitions in Parliament without granting them, for the people would not proceed to receive them respectfully, and postpone action upon them endlessly, unless they were ashamed to do so.

But after a time they, doubtless, reasoned with themselves, thus:

"'What will be the effect of encouraging and finally granting these petitions? If Slavery shall be abolished in the British colonies, by compensating shareholders for their losses, nobody in England will then have any interest in opposing the widest and most unlimited extension of the anti-Slavery sentiment. Englishmen will love to refer with pride and boasting to the large sum sacrificed by their government, with their concurrence, on the altar of liberty, justice, and humanity. They will then look to America, and they will see Slavery still there, for Southern slaveholders in America, of course, will never ruin themselves and their country by imitating British in abolishing it. Englishmen will then be easily excited, on account of American Slavery, to look down with scorn upon American pretensions to institutions, and if any popular orator, or writer, in England shall propose to deprive the Aristocracy of their powers and privileges, and to fortify his argument, shall refer to the prosperity of America under democratic institutions, he will be met with this scorn, and dedicated in his injury where.'

"This will be the effect in England of the Abolition of Slavery in the British colonies; but the most important effect will be the effect in America. America is divided almost equally between free States and Slave States—between States in which the negroes are to few that no harm results from their emancipation, and States in which Slavery is so deeply rooted that it can not be safely abolished without ruin to all classes of the population. In the free States the anti-slavery sentiment, a bitter hatred of Slavery and Slaveholders, can be excited almost as easily as in England, and, in process of time, by constantly fanning the flame, such a hostility can be kindled between the people of the two great sections that it will lead to the distraction of the Democratic party, and the failure of the grand experiment of democratic government by men of Anglo-Saxon race. And this failure of Democracy in America will be a new lease, and a long lease, to the English Aristocracy of their powers and privileges. In short, MR. Leggett, I believe that the English Aristocracy lent their influence to the Abolition of Slavery in the British colonies for the sake of the effect it would have in favor of the American Union. They did it to promote their own interest, to perpetuate their own privileges; by the destruction of the value and prosperity of democratic America, and to secure their object, they core be sure for a while of getting the whole profit of the commercial ruin of the British West India islands than for the ashes on that ciger that you are smoking."

In the above sketch, I repeat, I do not profess to give the language of MR. L., but have endeavored, in my own language, to convey the impression made upon my mind of the course of reasoning by which MR. W. came to his conclusion.

The writer has been contributed in England he knows not, but we do know that, while conservative Americans have often been publicly and wantonly insulted in England in connection with the Slavery question, and without apology or where apology was due from members of the Aristocracy, office Americans, whose chief claim to notice was the zeal and success with which they had attacked a fundamental law of their country and promoted bitter strife between the people of its two great sections, have been invited to the homes of the English nobility, flattered, honored, and encouraged on their return to America to renew their warfare upon the people and institutions of the South. These facts are readily explained on the theory of Deputy Commissary-General Wilson that the aim of the English Aristocracy is to perpetuate their own power and privileges by instigating the great American democratic republic, and they can not, we think, be satisfactorily explained on any other principle.

SIDNEY E. MORSE.

THE LOUNGER.

COMFORT FOR RACHEL.

THE bright and beautiful Thanksgiving is passed. The very air of wonderful exhilaration and prosperity is completed, and every body but his Honor the Mayor was in a grateful frame of mind. If that wonderful functionary does not feel grateful and happy, it is nobody's fault, it is only his misfortune. Nothing in a month more agreeable emotion than discontent, and happiness than indigestion. But the ways of his Honor are not as other men's ways. He is a most excellent Rachel Wood, it seems, refuses to be comforted.

Still the Lounger proposes to make an effort at consolation for him. It is true that he, too, hopes to help any body's state of mind as it was upon Thursday when all something was right and toward a present restoration of a cheerful tone of the system.

The honorable municipal chief magistrate is recommended to consider the plight of Mr. John Johns upon the late Thanksgiving festival. The M. J. C. M. had, beyond doubt, his savory roast turkey, his delectable side dishes, his smoking plum-pudding, mince-pie, and pumpkin-pie. He had, without question, all that makes dinner delightful; and a man who has a delightful dinner on Thanksgiving-day, has he not fulfilled the conditions?

Behold, then, in imagination, O Mayor, Mr. John Johns starting for a ten mile run upon a Western prairie at what is called a "Junction." It is just eight o'clock in the morning. The air is chilly; there is a streaking of rose upon the half frozen mud. There is a brilliant saloon, a group of small shanties; the station-house, and a roof of black mud. Mr. Johns steps cheerfully into the car-room, and asks when the train, which he is to take, connects at the station. "At two o'clock," is the extremely short reply of a youth of eighteen or nineteen, in very slouching clothes, head over one sideways at the hat, playing his gait a very saucy character, which is fully sustained by the straggly hair and freckled face.

The bar-room is large, and in one corner there are the basins and the towels with which the guests of the house perform their morning ablutions. A tall, gaunt man in India rubber shoes, with a wife and small boy, who are going to some Thanksgiving family party, hear the dreadful news about the train at two o'clock, and disappear into an inner room. Soon that room a woman presently emerged, and, standing at the door, says in a cold, distinct voice, "Who replenishes the fire in here?" The youth in the slouching clothes says, "I do." The voice says to him, "Won't you please replenish?" and the figure disappears.

By this time the train which brought Mr. John Johns disappears, and the dull reality begins to assert itself. The stove is red hot, and the air in the room; pulls out his watch and compares it with the clock behind the counter. The clock seems to have stopped at ten minutes, and the tiresome pendulum swings so lazily that its slow tick distinctly says to him, "I—is—a—very—long—long time—indeed—before—it—will—be—two—o'clock—half past—eight—tick—tick—tick." The great face of the clock, with its enormous figures, that repeat the fact of the extremely early hour in the most offensive manner, gradually assumes the likeness of a huge and unwinking eye, and looks at John Johns; and as he seats himself by the stove and turns his eyes away, he can not help hearing, "I—hanker—after—Sunday—and—I—don't—know—tick—tick—tick."

Then Johns actually rouses himself, and opens the door briskly and takes a turn in the fresh air. The morning is cloudy, and the road is very muddy. He picks his way there cautiously, occasionally slipping and sinking into the black ooze, while the brown and white monotonous landscape spreads around him. He saunters moodily and distinctly says to him, "Won't you have some more of it?" Then, turning upon a fence, he remembers the Thanksgivings of long ago, and this very day elsewhere. City streets, country landscapes, Thanksgiving days, all their varied scenes start in his life, sweep through his memory for a moment. Then the roar of a train arrives him. It comes whirling up to the station-house with a bell, and ringing a bell, snorts away over the prairie. It is not his train, for it is only a little past nine o'clock, and his train comes at two.

Mr. John Johns returns to the bar-room, and takes a book from his traveling-bag. The youth with the boots running down at the heel watches him curiously, and then begins to tease a dog, which snarls and snarls, but does not try to bite, evidently because it has tried biting before, and has been severely punished for its impudence. The great clock surveys Mr. John Johns calmly, and the slow pendulum constantly remarks to him that the time is passing very gradually indeed. Suddenly there is a bustle at the door, and two loud-talking men come in. "Can't you kill him?" "Why—why don't Joe?" "Oh, ken he's got a chore to do 'll take him all day." "Wal, I could shoot him." "Oh! darn, 'taint that. It's cutting on him up. I can shoot him. That won't take long, no how. But kin you cut him up?" "I guess I don't want to to-day." "Wal, Joe he's got a chore to do 'll take him all day." "Have a glass of beer?" They go to the counter, and the sandy-haired youth pumps the ale and says to the bar-keeper, "Can't you pizn a steer killed?" Neither of them seem to know, and Mr. John Johns is puzzled to determine. The two men depart. He falls to reading. The relentless clock remarks from the wall, "Only—ten—o'clock—tick—tick—still."

Once during the morning the tall, gaunt man in India rubbers hurries out from the "Ladies' room," and swings rapidly up to the bar. "Is there a newspaper here?" The youth shakes his head crisply and utters a short, blunt "No;" then walks the vacantly, while the tall man scuffles back again and shuts the door.

A little later two or three young men lounge in, stare at Mr. John Johns, and begin to talk very noisily. They laugh in a loud, dry way, apparently entirely without enjoyment or relish, and spoil at each other, and swear profusely, and brush their hair before the glass with a violence that is bad to be a dirty thing. Then they whistle without any tune, and Mr. John Johns thinks that it is nothing but the utter emptiness of their minds pouring out of their mouths. "They dance a convulsive jig upon the floor, and one by one they gradually go out, assuming the door after them.

Mr. Johns tries not to think of the delightful hours he might be passing elsewhere. He tries to forget that he is by peculiarly sacred to social pleasure. But while he is trying the remorseless clock slowly twangs out twelve, as slowly it has seemed to grudge every stroke as bringing so much comfort to its victim by the fire; and at the same moment the youth dives at the bell-wire and violently rushes to the door, and standing upon the platform, beats until the whole neighborhood is filled with a frightful roar. After such a tremendous summons the dining-room door is opened. Somebody must superintend, says "Dinner," and Mr. John Johns proceeds to his Thanksgiving feast, expecting, from the loud invitation and the long table, that a great assembly will dine. The dining-room is entirely bare. It is ingeniously comfortless and cheerless. Nothing, certainly, but an American tavern would be capable of such destitution of every sign of domesticity. Mr. Johns advances to the seat of honor and seats himself before a large, round stool, such as accountants use. The moment he is seated a girl rushes from behind a door and vanishes at his ear "Roast beef, roast pork, boiled beef." He asks for roast beef, and a plate is presently dumped before him, while two women enter simply speaking and seat themselves upon the opposite side of the table. They are oppressively silent. Then the girl-mute disappears for them "Roast beef, roast pork, boiled beef," one says, "Roast beef, ma'am," and the other says, "Yes'm." Then they seem to sink down into unutterable depths of silence. Mr. John Johns, hoping to rally his own spirits a little and promote conversation, modestly says to them, "Roast beef is brought," "May I give you a little potato?" But the effect is so alarming—for "yes" or "thank you" comes so close upon a hysteric cry—that Mr. Johns tries no more, and he and the two women and three men, who have entered while he carved, brushed hair and dirty hands, eat their Thanksgiving dinner in solemn silence.

There was a long time afterward before the train arrived, during which Mr. John Johns walked upon the platform and smoked a meditative cigar. Presently he heard the far-off whistle, and stepping into the bar-room he looked with calm contempt upon the huge clock that implacably ended its task, and in very measured tones remarked: "It's—now—two—o'clock—and—you—can—go—good—by John—I—shall—never—again—next—year—tick—tick—tick."

Now, in perusing this little story of real life, why should not Rachel Wood be comforted? If he can not have every thing his own way, let him reflect that there are other unhappy fellow-beings perhaps even more unhappy than he. And if he can only see the matter in this light, although it were but with a single eye, there can be no doubt that Mr. John Johns will willingly have lent his Thanksgiving dinner.

A TRIP TO COVENTRY.

"ARTHUR" writes to the Lounger that he has been threatened by a set of young men with whom he associates at the bar, the continuance of which he expects in public certain opinions upon certain subjects, that they will join to Coventry him. Now shall I do? asks Arthur. Go to Coventry, replies the Lounger.

Remember that there are two sides to every excommunication, social, ecclesiastical, or political. Pope Leo excommunicated Martin Luther, but Luther excommunicated the Pope, and brought him to. And so long as you can honestly laugh, you are safe. When Sir Samuel Romilly succeeded to abolish the penalty of death for stealing a pocket handkerchief, the lawyers tried to send him to Coventry for his inhumanity, and declared that an innovation endangered the whole criminal law. Sir Samuel laughed and pushed on, and presently suggested the abolition of that part of the punishment for treason which consists in drawing and quartering the offender and throwing his bowels into his face, while he yet lived. Thereupon the Attorney-general eloquently asked, "Are the ancient bulwarks and safe-guards of the British Constitution to be thus wantonly overthrown?" But Sir Samuel only laughed, and somebody asked whether the bowels of traitors were the bulwarks of the British Constitution.

Master Arthur, thus honestly and speak honestly and take the consequences. In this time and country the public common-sense soon hastens round to the defense of honesty. It may not agree with the opinion, but it does, at heart, respect the sincerity. And if it seem to you very slow in coming, and you ask yourself a hundred times whether honesty be the best policy, you will find that you can not answer your question until you have determined what policy is. Then it is very easy to pull out a lounger the pump by the force of moments, and a hundred other practical jokes—don't you see the exquisite humor of it? Don't you see what wits and gallant gentlemen they are who do it? Faith, they may easily be a fair half a dozen fellows to bully one?

This is the noble sport known as "hazing." It is American as tarring and feathering, and it is so much less flagging as this, that in the English system one fellow subdues another to his service for a certain term, and in ours no one dares to haze alone, but goes in a squad, which is the very perfection of pure bullying.

It was high time that common sense put an end to this stupidity, and the faculty of Harvard deserve hearty cheers for their prompt action. It is never manly to submit to injustice, is it? And how much better it is not to submit because he would not think the fellow a spoon and milksop who submitted quietly to such indignities. The hazers at Harvard had no right to complain of the revolver which was suddenly drawn upon them. It may have been wrong to draw it, but the first wrong to be corrected was the cowardly bullying which produced it.

The phrase "fellow" has always despised the English fellow for fagging and for being fagged. Is not his contempt a sharpened arrow against his own hazing and being hazed?

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE BLACK LAUREATE.

The last bit of Blacks (we forget their names) are as follows: "Blacks" is the name of the gipsy negroes who have pretended them. We are delighted to learn that on the 27th of October last, the Queen of the future (many and many a long day off may his nomination be) Edward the Seventh, of Lowland, had the honor to be clothed of the following exquisite Poem, which was sung at night, by command of her Majesty, and received forty-seven times, by an intelligent British audience:

Home de Prince hab come,
He am not a bibber,
We hab jolt de Prince oh Whales,
So we neet not blubber.
Chick-a-boo, chick-a-boo,
Lobby bobby bor O.
Home de Prince oh Whales hab come,
Sailing in de Hero.
Chick-a-boo, chick-a-boo, etc.

THE WAY OF FOOD.—When an argument gets into such a dreadful fog that it is impossible to see one's way through it, it may be very safely left to the action of the necessary food.

As the Hero was short of fuel, the Duke inquired of the Prince whether he should signal to the Ariadne for any? "I dare say," replied the Prince, "you will probably run for it; they will never be such fools as to send coals to Newcastle."

EARLY RISING.—Hungry is trying to get itself into the world, but finds that it has only to be forced, if Hungry does succeed in fitting early, that it may have the effect of defeating the end for which it was designed.

"COMPANIONS OF THE BATH."—Soap and Towels.

A man's good fortune often turns his head: his bad fortune often averts his heart from the right way.

Why is a sensitive lover's absence upon her waits-guard, but it is more important that she keep watch and guard upon her charms?

It is a general thing to see roses and lilies gleaming upon a young lady's cheek, but a bad sign to see a man's face look cold in death.

Corkscrews have sunk more people than cork-jackets will ever keep up.

Laziness begins in cobwebs and ends in iron chains. It creeps over a man, and then imperceptibly that he is found tight before he knows it.

DR. FRANKLIN says that "every little fragment of the public domain, rightly tilled, is, in the measure the day broaks, set yourself at once to save the piece.

HOOD'S JOKES ON HERBERT.—"The very degrees to artificiality which have led to the decline of the pun, blint plainly of the "ills flesh is heir to;" my cooks have become great, and my confectioners have grown into learned, and by a worse bargain than Peter Schlemihl's, I seem to have received the shadow without the substance. Shadow, indeed, happens to germerate old pun wires, I am of a bad color and my nose is out of joint. Besides, my handwriting, with pen and pencil, in spite of the M.D.s, who ordered me to do nothing, is found fault with by the printers, the manuscript writing and drawing. Besides which, for all my ill-luck, big-nose, there is one man coming to draw me, and assuredly to model me, so if I were fat enough to feast. Luckily I am capital at cutting but my own throat, and if I decide to walking or standing, I am to be dashed to a block on my plan, which, by-the-way, have obtained into modern.

When you negotiate for a house having all the modern improvements, you will generally find that a mortgage is one of them.

What would this world be without women?—A perfect blank—like a sheet of paper, not even ruled.

HUMORS THE NEW SAINT.—"Hungry as a hunter," is not a bad comparison; at least, so thought a young Oxford friend of ours, as he was riding home on a hack hunter, after a long day with the V. W. H. Twenty miles to go, and an hour and forty minutes down the 'ole, would create an appetite under his ribs of death; and our young student, who was then on a cotton-spinner, was rather remarkable, even among the "good-grabbers," as having a peculiar trick of his own. Dismounting from his quadruped, and entering a small road-side inn, he begged the landlady to get something before him, "Something soon appeared in the shape of the remnants of a mutton-chop, over which our student began to work away. Young Nimrod was hard at it in the twinkling of a bat's e'e'e,' as the Scotch say, when Mrs. Stone, not liking to see his knife and fork fall much, but remained but a Pollen time. 'Mr. Arthur,' exclaimed the landlady, would have prevented Friend Waterhouse! Hawkins to rearrange. 'Capital fare!' quoth Hawkins, 'I never ate a heartier supper; wait to Granny Hinkin's cross-tarts. And pray what might you charge for your very good supper?' 'Why, sir,' said the host and hostess, and lots of things in it.'" And this, then, was the first young disciple of Izaak Walton, shortly balancing on his fork what appeared to be the vertebræ of a fish-fry. 'Mr. Arthur,' said the host, 'you are fish.' 'Why, dearie,' continued she, attentively examining the fragment of fish. 'Well, that is lucky! If I don't eat little fish's small-teeth comb, and I have been a-looking for it there ten days!'

MRS. Partington says that "when she was a gal she used to dance, and always kept a beau next her to save room. But now," says she, "the gals undergo all sorts of deformities. All sorts of contrivances upon heaven revolves on their dear selves." The old lady drew down her spoon, and thumbed her sister-in-law on the head like a mace, when men could depreciate the worth of the female sex. "Deformities, indeed," said she, "or many years we murdered everything that you gals must make beaus and get husbands as soon as you can, or else you won't be any left."

"Why so, aunt?"

"Why, child, in the paper that we must have got almost twelve thousand post-offices, and nearly all of 'em discontinued every day."

"Pray, Doctor Skrails, what sin birth is a horrorscope?" asked Mrs. Errington.

"Why, ahem!" replied the Doctor, "you perceives that when the maternal hour is so far procrastinated by a superabundant plenitude of sleepiness, melancholy sporties, mustardile, expectorant components of a crustacea-pectory salid and a few pints of alcoholic accidents, an unusual expansion of the stomachic integument ensues, which, in the purposes of distinguishing ordinary infirmities, makes correct functions, confuse the nerve-optic system, and gives a scope to the fancy."

"La me, how very strange!" said the old lady; "and pray, Doctor, meaning it is to have a baby?"

"Well, Dinah," said a would-be belle to a black girl, "they say beauty soon fades, but do you see any of my beauty fading?" "Why, missus, you always was pleased my complexion."

"No, no, miss, but den me kinder think—"

"Think what, Dinah? You're baithful."

"Oh, yes, missus, I'm baithful, but den me kinder takes me how mean don't retain her color quite so well as colored lady."

A lady asked her gardener why the weeds always outgrew and covered in the flowers? "Indeed, ma'am," he said, "the soil is mother of the weeds, but only step-mother of the flowers."

After casting a glance at our own weaknesses, how eagerly does our vanity console itself with deploring the infirmities of our friends!

A certain man says that one of his boys knows nothing, and the other does. The question is, which knows the most?

A garrulous boy, who had annoyed by his frivolous remarks his partner in the ball-room, among other empty things said to him that he had several times "put his foot in" his partner's dress. "No," was the reply, "but I've often had them bored!"

"What do you suppose," said a young man to one of a similar, looking on one of the new pieces, "is the cause of the cold, 'Cod by what is,' on the other, "The Commercial wealth of England."—"I say," said he, "God and the Commercial wealth of England, you mean."

NIGGER CONFUSION.—"Pose I shoot bullet two dead beast will him pistol, what ess I make beside round hole? Only him up? Why, I beat you a thistle."

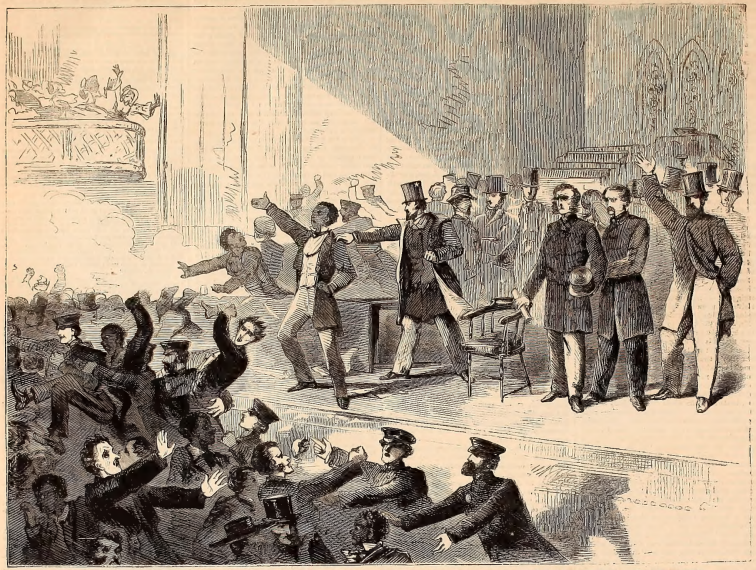
FOREMOUTH.—Lady Margaret asked somebody for a pretty pattern for a night-cap.—"Well," said the person, "what pattern of nightcaps do you prefer?"—"Oh! child," said she, "but you know, in case of fire!"

AFFRAY IN BOSTON.

WE publish on page 788, from a sketch by a person who was present, a picture of the riot which took place on Boston Common, in Tremont Street, on the occasion of the attempt of Garrison, Redpath, Sanborn, Douglass, and other abolitionists to celebrate the anniversary of the execution of John Brown. No sooner had the abolitionists appeared in the hall than a number of citizens of Boston proceeded to organize the meeting. This was resisted by the abolitionists and a scuffle ensued; but the latter soon carried their point, and organized the meeting by electing Mr. Fay chairman. A disorderly mob then broke into Mr. Fay, in spite of frequent interruptions by Fred Douglass, and the following resolutions were put and carried:

1. That this is fitting year to celebrate the anniversary of the execution of John Brown for his practical and bloody efforts to create an insurrection among the slaves of Virginia, for the people of this Commonwealth have no sympathy with, nor express their horror of the men and of the principles which led to the forcy; therefore it is

2. Resolved, That we do virtuous and loyal citizens of this Commonwealth ought to countenance, sympathize with, or encourage persons with, any effort to subvert that John Brown and his aiders and abettors in that nefarious enterprise ought to be regarded as traitors.



3. That the present perilous juncture in our political affairs, when the existence of the nation is imperiled, requires of every citizen who loves his country to come forward and to rally around the stars and the valor of the Union, alike important to the free labor of the North, the slave labor of the South, and to the interests of commerce, manufactures, and agriculture of the world.

4. That the people of this city and town in Virginia our warmest thanks for the conservative spirit they have manifested in the present crisis, the unanimity and harmony which made upon them by John Brown and his associates, setting at defiance the treasonable efforts of a few agitators, and a few fanatics of the North, to create a disturbance among us, and we hereby resolve to aid us in opposing the fanaticism which is now attempting to subvert the Constitution of the Union.

5. That the people of this city here submitted too long in allowing irresponsible individuals and political demagogues of every description to hold public meetings to disturb the public peace and misrepresent us abroad. They have become a nuisance, which in self-defense we are determined shall henceforward be summarily abated.

6. That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each of the persons named in the call for this meeting."

After the passage of the resolutions, speeches were made by Fred Douglass and others, and the meeting ended in the expulsion from the hall of the abolitionists and negroes by sheer force.

CHAPTER VI.

My state of mind regarding the pilfering from which I had been so unexpectedly exonerated, did not impel me to frank disclosure; but, with it had some dregs of good at the bottom of it.

I do not recall that I felt any tenderness of conscience in reference to Mrs. Joe when the fear of being found out was lifted off me. But I loved Joe—perhaps for no better reason in those early days than because the dear fellow let me love him—and, as to him, my inner self was not so easily composed. It was much upon my mind (particularly when I first saw him looking about for his file) that I ought to tell Joe the whole truth. Yet I did not, and for the reason that I mistrusted that if I did he would think me worse than I was. The fear of losing Joe's confidence and of therefore losing him in the chimney corner at night staring drearily at my forever lost companion and friend, tied up my tongue. A morbidly sensitive state of mind that if Jo knew it, I never afterward could see him at the friendly feeling his fair whiting, without thinking that he was meditating on it. That if Joe knew it, I never afterward could see him glance, however casually, at yesterday's meat or pudding when it came on to-day's table, without thinking that he was debating whether I had been in the pantry. That if Joe knew it, and at any subsequent period of our joint domestic life remarked that his beer was flat or thick, the conviction that he suspected Tar in it would bring a rush of blood to my face. In a word, I was too young to do what I knew to be right, as I had been too cowardly to avoid doing what I knew to be wrong. I had had no intercourses with people at that time, and I mistrusted none of the host of people who act in this manner; quite an unthought capital, I made the discovery of the line of action for myself.

As I was sleepy before we were far away from the prison-ship, Joe took me on his back sometimes and carried me home. He must have had a tiresome journey of it, for Mr. Wopsle, being knocked up, was in such a very bad temper that if the Church had been thrown open he probably would have excommunicated the whole expedition, beginning with Joe and myself. In his simple lay capacity he simply persisted in sitting down in the dump to such an insane extent that, when his curt was taken off to be dried at the kitchen fire, the circumstantial evidence on his trousers would have hanged him if it had been a capital offence.

By that time I was staggering on the kitchen floor like a little drunkard, through having been newly set upon my feet, and through having been fast asleep, and through waking in the heat and lights and noise of tongues. As I came to myself (with the aid of a heavy thump between the shoulders, and the restorative exclamation of "Yah! Was there ever such a boy as this!" from my sister) I found Joe telling them about the convict's confession, and all the visitors suggesting different ways by which he had got into the pantry. Mr. Pumblechook made out, after carefully surveying the premises, that he had first got upon the roof of the forge, and had then got upon the roof of the house, and had then let himself down the kitchen chimney by a rope made of his bedding cut into strips; and as Mr. Pumblechook was very positive and drove his own chaise-cart—over every body—it was agreed that it must be so. Mr. Wopsle, indeed, wilfully cried out "No!" with the feeble malice of a tired man; but as he had no theory, and no cost on, he was unanimously set at naught—not to mention his smoking hard behind, as he stood with his back to the kitchen fire to draw the damp out, which was not calculated to inspire confidence.

The two all I heard that night before my sister clutched me, as a slumberous offence to the company's eyesight, and assisted me up to bed with such a strong hand that I seemed to have twenty boots on, and to be dangling them all against the edges of the stairs. My state of mind as I have described it, began before I was up in the morning, and lasted long after the subject had died out, and ceased to be mentioned saving on exceptional occasions.

CHAPTER VII.

At the time when I stood in the church-yard, reading the family tombstones, I had just enough learning to be able to spell them out. My construction even of their simple meaning was not very correct, "for I read "wife of the Above" as a customary reference to my father's association to a better world; and if any one of my deceased relations had been referred to as "Below," I have no doubt I should have formed the worst opinions of that member of the family. Neither were my notions of the theological conditions to which my Catechism bound me at all accurate, for I have a lively remembrance that I supposed my declaration that I was "to walk in the same all the days of my life" laid me under an obligation always to go through the village from our house in one particular direction, and never to vary it by turning down by the wheelwright's or up by the mill.

When I was old enough I was to be apprenticed to Joe, and until I could assume that dignity I was not to be what Mrs. Joe called "Pumpernickel," or pampered. Therefore, I was not only odd-boy about the forge, but if any neighbour happened to want an extra boy to frighten birds, or pick up stones, or do any such job, I was favored with the employment; but in order that our superior position might not be compromised thereby, a money-box was kept on the kitchen mantel-shelf, into which it was impolitely made known that all my earnings were dropped. I have an impression that they were to be contributed eventually toward the Parochial Clock of the National Debt, but I know I had no hope of any personal participation in the treasure.

Mr. Wopsle's great-aunt kept an evening school in the village; that is to say, she was an ancient woman of limited means and unlimited infirmity, who used to go to sleep from six to seven every evening, in the society of youth who paid twopence per week each for the improving opportunity of seeing her do it. She rented a three-roomed cottage, and Mr. Wopsle had the room up-stairs, where the schooling used to perchance him reading aloud in a most dignified and terrific manner, and occasionally bumping on the ceiling. There was a fiction that Mr. Wopsle "examined" the scholars once a quarter, but what form the examination took on the Passions, wherein I particularly venerated Mr. Wopsle as Fear, whistling to keep his courage up, I was not practically informed. It was in later life, when I fell into the society of the Passions, and compared them with Mr. Wopsle, rather to the disadvantage of both gentlemen.

Mr. Wopsle's great-aunt, besides keeping this Educational Institution, kept—in the same room—a little general shop. She had no idea what sort of stock, and rarely got any order for any thing in it was; but there was a little greasy memorandum-book kept in a drawer, which served as a Catalogue of Prices, and by this oracle Biddy arranged all the shop transactions. Biddy was Mr. Wopsle's great-aunt's granddaughter, and I confess myself quite unequal to the working out of the problem what relation she was to Mr. Wopsle. She was an orphan like myself; like me, too, had been brought up by hand. She was most noticeable, I thought, in respect of her extremities; for her hair always wanted brushing, her hands always wanted washing, and her shoes always wanted mending and pulling up by the heel. This description must be received, however, with a week-day limitation. On Sundays she went to church elaborated.

Much of my unassisted self, and more by the help of Biddy than of Mr. Wopsle's great-aunt, I wrestled through the alphabet as if it had been a bramble-bush; getting considerably worried and scratched in the process. Biddy, after I fell among those thieves, the nine figures, who seemed every evening to do something new to disguise themselves and their operations, took me next with my slate, expending great efforts on the production of a letter for which I think I must have been a full year after our hunt upon the marshes, for it was a long time after, and it was winter and a hard frost. With an alphabet on the hearth at my feet for reference, I contrived in an hour or two to print and smear this opinion:

"MI DEER JO i OFE U R KRWIFE WELL i OPE i SHAL SOON B HABLE 2 TEECH U TO AN THEN WE SHOEL B SO GLORD AN WE SI M PRENGD 2 U JO WOT LARX AN LOVE ME I REMAIN DEER PIP."

There was no indispensable necessity for my communicating with Joe by letter, inasmuch as he sat beside me and we were alone. But I delivered this written communication (slate and all) with my own hand, and Joe received it as a miracle of erudition.

"I say, Pip, old chap!" cried Joe, opening his blue eyes wide, "what a scholar you are! An't you?"

"I should like to be," said I, glancing at the slate as he held it, with a misgiving that the writing was rather hilly.

"Why, here's a J," said Joe, "and a O equal to anythink! Here's a J and a O, Pip, and a JO, Joe."

I had never heard Joe read aloud to any greater extent than this monosyllable, and I had observed at church last Sunday when I accidentally held our Prayer-Book upside down, that it seemed to suit his convenience quite as well as if it had been right. Wishing to embrace the present occasion of finding out whether in teaching Joe I should have to begin quite at the beginning, I said, "Ah! But read the rest, Joe."

"The rest, eh, Pip?" said Joe, looking at it with a slowly awakening eye. "One, two, three. Why, here's three Js and three Os, and three J-Os, less in it, Pip!"

I leaned over Joe, and, with the aid of my forefinger, read him the whole letter.

"Astonishing!" said Joe, when I had finished. "You are a scholar."

"How do you spell Gargery, Joe?" I asked him, with a modest patronage.

"I don't spell it at all," said Joe.

"But supposing you did?"

"It can't be supposed," said Joe. "But I'm uncommon fond of reading, too."

"Are you, Joe?"

"On-common. Give me," said Joe, "a good book, or a good newspaper, and sit me down afore a good fire, and I ask no better. Lord!" he continued, after rubbing his knees a little, "when you do come to a J and a O, and says you, 'Here's a J and a O, Joe,' how interesting reading is!"

I derived from this that Joe's education, like steam, was yet in its infancy. Pursuing the subject, I inquired:

"Didn't you ever go to school, Joe, when you were as little as me?"

"No, Pip."

"Why didn't you ever go to school, Joe, when you were as little as me?"

"Well, Pip," said Joe, taking up the poker and settling himself to his usual occupation when he was thoughtful, of slowly raking the fire between the bars: "I was a-going, I see, two interesting reading is!"

"Were you, Joe?"

"Consequence—my mother and me we ran away from your sister several times; and then my mother she'd go out to work, and she'd say, 'Joe,' she'd say, 'now, please God, you shall have schooling, child,' and she'd put me to school. But my father were that good in his hart that he couldn't abear to be without us. So he'd come with a most tremenjious crowd and make such a row at the doors of the houses where we was put, as they used to be obligated to have no more to do with us and to give us up to him. And then he took us home and hammered me. Which your sister, Pip," said Joe, pausing in his meditative raking of the fire, and looking at me, "you have had a good deal to say concerning, I'm sure."

"Certainly, poor Joe!"

"Though mind you, Pip," said Joe, with a judicial touch or two of the poker on the bar, "rendering unto all their due, and maintaining equal justice betwixt man and man, my father were that good in his hart, don't you see?"

I didn't see; but I didn't say so.

"Well!" Joe pursued, "somebody must keep the pot a-biling, Pip, or the pot won't bile, don't you know?"

I saw that, and said so.

"Consequence—my father didn't make objections to my going to work; so I went to work at my present calling, which were his too, if he would have followed it, and it weren't tolerable hard, I assure you, Pip. In time I were able to keep him, and I kep him till he were cut off in a purple lepric fit, And it were my intentions to have had a put upon his tombstone that Whatsumever the failings on his part, Remember reader he were dear good in his hart."

Joe recited this couplet with such manifest pride and careful perspicuity that I asked him if he had made it himself?

"I made it," said Joe, "my own self. I made it in a moment. It was like striking out a horseshoe complete in a single blow. I never see so much surprised in all my life —couldn't credit my own eyes—tell you the truth, hardly believed it was my own self. As I was saying, Pip, it were my intentions to have had it cut over him; but poetry costs money, cut it how you will, small or large, and it were not done. Not to mention brevers, all the money that could be spared were wanted for my mother. She were in poor clth, and quite broke. She weren't long of following, poor soul, and her share of peace come round at last."

Joe's blue eyes turned a little watery: he rubbed, first one of them, and then the other, in a most uncongenial and uncomfortable manner, with the round knob on the top of the poker.

"If it were but lonesome then," said Joe, "living here alone, and I got acquainted with your sister. Now, Pip," Joe looked firmly at me, as if he knew I was not going to agree with him, "your sister is a fine figure of a woman."

I could not help looking at the fire, in an obvious state of doubt.

"Whatever family opinions, or whatever the world's opinions, on that subject may be, Pip, your sister is a fine figure of a woman. I tell you the poker after every word following—"a fine figure—of—a—woman!"

I could think of nothing better to say than "I am glad you think so, Joe."

"So am I," returned Joe, catching me up. "I am glad I think so, Pip. A little redness, or a little matter of Bone, here or there, what does it signify to Me?"

I sagaciously observed, if it didn't signify to him, to whom did it signify?

"Certainly!" assented Joe. "That's it. You're right, old chap! When I got acquainted with your sister, it were the talk how she was bringing you up by hand. Very kind of her too, all the folks said, and I said, along with all the folks. As to you," Joe pursued, with a countenance expressive of seeing something very nasty indeed: "if you could have been aware how small and flabby and mean you was, dear me, you'd have formed the most contemptible opinions of yourself!"

Not exactly relishing this, I said, "Never mind me, Joe."

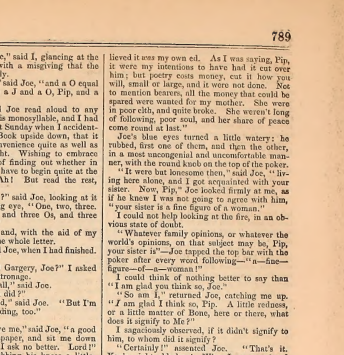
"But I did mind you, Pip," he returned, with tender simplicity. "When I offered to your sister to keep company, and to be asked in church at such times as she was willing and ready to come to the forge, I said to her, 'And bring the poor little child. God bless the poor little child,' I said to your sister, 'there's room for him at the forge!'"

I broke out crying and begging pardon, and hugged Joe round the neck; who dropped the poker to hug me, and to say, "Ever the best of friends; don't cry, Pip! Don't cry, old chap!"

When this little interruption was over, Joe resumed:

"Well, you see, Pip, and here we are! That's about where it lights; here we are! Now, when you take me in hand in my learning, Pip (and I shall you flattering myself a good deal, most awful dull), Mrs. Joe mustn't see too much of what we're up to. It must be done, as I may say, on the sly. And why on the sly? I'll tell you why, Pip."

He had taken up the poker again; without which, I doubt if he could have proceeded in his demonstration.



"Your sister is given to government."

"Given to government, Joe?" I was startled, for I had some shadowy idea (and I am afraid I must add, hope) that Joe had divorced her in favor of the Lords of the Admiralty, or Treasury.

"Given to government," said Joe. "Which I meantersay the government of you and myself."

"Oh!"

"And she an't over partial to having scholars on the premises," Joe continued, "and in particular would be over partial to my being a scholar, for fear as I might rise. Like a sort of rebel, don't you see?"

"AT SUCH TIMES AS YOUR SISTER IS ON THE RAM-PAGE, PIP."

I was going to retort with an inquiry, and had got as far as "Why—" when Joe stopped me.

"Stay a bit. I know what you're a going to say, Pip; stay a bit! I don't deny that your sister comes the Mo-gul over us, now and again. I don't deny that she do throw us falls, and that she do drop down upon us heavy. At such times as your sister is on the Ram-page, Pip," Joe sank his voice to a whisper and glanced at the door, "under compulsion I've to admit that she is a Buster."

Joe pronounced this word as if it began with at least twelve capital Bs.

"Why don't I rise? That were your observation when I broke it off, Pip?"

"Yes, Joe."

"Well," said Joe, passing the poker into his left hand, that he might feel his whisker; and I had no hope of him when he took to that placid occupation; "your sister's a master-mind. A master-mind."

"What's that?" I asked, in some hope of bringing him round. But Joe was readier with his definition than I had expected, and completely stopped me by arguing circularly and answering with a broad look, "Her."

"And I an't a master-mind," Joe resumed, when his hand unfixed his look, and got it to his whisker. "And it last of all, Pip—and this I want to say very soreus to you, old chap—I see so much as your mother of a master-mind, a-thinking, and slaving, and breaking her honest heart, and never getting no peace in her morral days, that I'm dead afeerd of going your way. I'm not of not doing what's right by a woman, and I'd far rather of the two go wrong the t'other way and be a little discountenanced myself. I wish it was only me that got put out, Pip; I wish there was no Tickler for no one but me. I wish I could take it all on myself; but this is the up-and-down-and-straight on it, Pip, and I hope you'll overlook my choice comings."

Young as I was, I believe that I dated a new admiration of Joe from that night. We were equals always, as we had been before; but afterward at quiet times, when I sat looking at Joe and thinking about him, I had a more definite notion of feeling conscious that I was looking up to Joe in my heart.

"However," said Joe, rising to replenish the fire, "here's the Dutch-clock a working himself up to being equal to striking Eight o'ten, and she's not come home yet! I lay that Pumblechook's mare mayn't have set a forefoot on a piece of dirty road, then down."

Mrs. Joe made occasional trips with Uncle Pumblechook on market days, to assist him in buying such articles and stuffs and groceries as required a woman's judgment; Uncle Pumblechook being a bachelor and reposing no confidence in female servants. This was one such day, and Mrs. Joe was out on one of these expeditions.

Joe made the fire and swept the hearth, and then we went out to listen for the chaise-cart. It was a dry, cold night, and the wind blew keenly, and the frost was white and hard. A man would die to-night of lying out on the marshes, I thought; and I looked at the stars, and felt very solemn, and considered how awful it would be for a man to turn his face up to them as he froze to death, and see no help or pity in the whole glittering multitude.

"Here comes the mare," said Joe, "ringing like bells!"

The sound of her iron shoes upon the hard road was quite musical, as she came along at a much brisker trot than usual. We got a chair ready for Mrs. Joe's alighting, and stirred up the fire that her node might see a bright one, and took a final survey of the kitchen that nothing might be out of place. When we had completed these preparations they drove up, wrapped to the eyes. Mrs. Joe was soon landed, and Uncle Pumblechook was soon down, covering the mare with a cloth, and we were soon all in the kitchen, carrying so much cold air in with us that it seemed to drive all the heat out of the fire.

"Now," said Mrs. Joe, unwrapping herself with haste and excitement, and throwing her bonnet back on her shoulders where it hung by the strings, "if this boy ar's grateful this night, he never will be!"

"I looked as grateful as any boy possibly could who was busily uninformed why he ought to be grateful.

"It's only to be surprised," said my sister, "that he won't be Perpetuated. But I have my fears."

"She an't in that line, manj" said Mr. Pumblechook. "Don't know better."

She? I looked at Joe, making the motion with my lips and eyebrows, "She?" Joe looked at me, making the motion with his lips and eyebrows, "She?" My sister catching him in the act, Joe rubbed the back of his hand across his face with his usual conciliatory air on such occasions, and looked at her.

"Well," said my sister in her snappish way, "Is the house a-fire?"

"Which some individual," Joe politely hinted, "mentioned—she."

"And she is a she, I suppose?" said my sister. "Unless your name is Miss Havisham it an't. And I doubt if even you'll go so far as that."

"Miss Havisham, up town?" said Joe.

"Is there any Miss Havisham down town?" returned my sister. "She wants this boy to go and play there. And of course he's going. And he had better play there," said my sister, shaking her head at me as an encouragement to be extremely light and sportive, "or I'll work him.

I had heard of Miss Havisham up town—every body for miles round had heard of Miss Havisham up town—as an immensely rich and grim old lady, who lived in a large and dismal house barricaded against robbers, and who led a life of seclusion.

"Well to be sure!" said Joe, astounded. "I wonder how she come to know Pip?"

"Noodle!" cried my sister. "Who said she knew him?"

—"Which some individual," Joe again politely hinted, "mentioned that she wanted him to play with Estella?"

"And couldn't she ask Uncle Pumblechook if he knew of a boy to go and play? But it is just barely possible that Uncle Pumblechook may be a tenant of hers, and that he may sometimes—just sometimes, mind you—rent a pew. Is that would be requiring too much of you—but sometimes—go there to pay his rent? And couldn't she then ask Uncle Pumblechook if he knew of a boy to go and play there? And couldn't Uncle Pumblechook, actuated by every conscientious and thoughtful for us—though you may not think it, Joseph," in a tone of the deepest reproach, as if he were the most callous of mortals, "then mention this boy, standing Prancing here"—which I solemnly declare I was not doing—"that I have been for over a month a-hinting to?"

"Good again!" cried Joe, with unbounded admiration. "Well put! Prettily pointed! Good indeed! Now Joseph, you know the case."

"No, Joseph don't know the case, still in a reproachful manner, while Joe apologetically drew the back of his hand across and across his nose, as if he were mentally substituting it for the file. "I know the case. You may consider that you do, but you do not, Joseph. For you do not know that Miss Havisham, which has brought up this boy expressly to please herself, has offered to take him into town to-night in his own chaise-cart, and to keep him to-night, and to take him back to-morrow, and to keep him a bench to-morrow morning, and to give him wittles in the mean time. Which wittles will be sent in by me!" cried my sister, casting off her bonnet in sudden descent upon the table, and untying the mere Mooncalfs, with Uncle Pumblechook waiting, and the mare champing cold on the door, and the boy grimed with work and dirt from the hair of his head to the sole of his foot!"

With that she seized me, as if, like an eagle on a lamb, and my face was forced into wooden bowls in sinks, and my head was put under taps of water-butts, and I was soaped and kneaded, and towelled, and thumped, and harrowed, and rasped, until I really was quite beside myself. If I may have occasion yet I hope to have a still better acquainted than any living authority with the indign ities that can be inflicted upon a boy sympathetically over the human countenance.)

When my ablutions were completed, I was put into clean linen of the stiffest character, like a young penitent into sackcloth, and was trussed up in my tightest and fearfullest suit. I was then delivered over to Uncle Pumblechook, who formally received me as if he were the Sheriff, and who let upon me the hands of the clock (I knew he had been dying to make all along).

"Boy, be forever grateful to all friends, but especially to them which brought you up by hand!"

"Good-by, Joe!"

"God bless you, Pip, old chap!"

I had never parted from him before, and what with my feelings and what with soap-suds I could at first see no stars from which to steer. But they twinkled out one by one, without throwing any light by which I could see my way on earth I was going to play at Miss Havisham's, and what on earth I was expected to play at.

DEPARTURE OF THE ST. LOUIS BRIGADE FOR KANSAS.

We engrave on page 789, from a sketch obligingly furnished us by a correspondent, the departure of the St. Louis Brigade for the Kansas frontier, on 25th November. The Brigade was ordered out in consequence of the Montgomery outrages; and time being pressing, the march began on Sunday morning. The St. Louis Democrat thus describes the scene:

"By ten o'clock the various commands were marching to the Second Street rendezvous. The companies of the First Regiment formed in line on Sixth Street, and were saluted by the officers of the companies of the Second Regiment gathered between Fourth and Sixth on Walnut. As the companies presented, and came to a shoulder, the great difficulty was experienced in finding room for the most necessary articles to be carried in the wagons of the commandants along the line. The Brigade staff was performing similar duties on the north side of Chestnut and Sixth streets; while the anxious members of the staff generally were almost compelled to take over the things that every where impeded them.

"The Brigade line at last was formed, column and line order on Sixth Street, under Brigadier-General Frost and his aids, in accordance with programme. Not only were the streets completely jammed with spectators, but windows, piazzas, awnings and roofs of houses in the vicinity were filled with eager lookers-on. The sight was well worth seeing. Nearly two thousand handsomely drilled members, and in full fatigue dress, laden with the travelling encumbrances of war, presented an unusual and rather unique appearance."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, December 3, the United States Congress met at Washington, being the second session of the thirty-sixth Congress. As on other occasions, the Senate was led by Vice-President Breckinridge, and a quorum being present, a message was, on motion, received from the House reporting that the Senate was ready for business. A Joint Committee was also appointed to wait upon the President to state that Congress was ready to receive any communication he had to make.——In the House, after prayer by the Chaplain, the Senate's message was received and a Joint Committee appointed. Mr. Grow moved the reconsideration of the vote disposing of the Homestead Bill. Before the question was put, the vote drawn for seats, and the House adjourned.

On Tuesday, December 4, in the Senate, the President's Message was read. He reference to the Committee of Ways and Means. Mr. Corwin took exception of that part which refers to the perilous condition of the country to a Committee of one from each State. Singleton of Mississippi, Jones of Georgia, Hawkins of Florida, and Clopton and Moore of Alabama, declined to vote, as their States were, in their opinion, already out of the Union. The House then adjourned (yeas 145 to 38. Mr. Morris tried to introduce a resolution declaring that the Union was not an agreement between, moved and carried.

On Wednesday, December 5, in the Senate, Senator Powell, of Kentucky, moved that so much of the President's Message as relates to the domestic troubles of the country be referred to a Select Committee. The motion was agreed to, and Senators Powell, Crittenden, Bigler, introduced a resolution for the establishment of an armed force to protect the property of Free States, for the maintenance of general peace, the prevention of the invasion of one State by citizens of another, and for the effective extention of the Fugitive Slave Law. It was made the order of the day for Monday next.——In the House, Mr. Sherman, then quoted debate on the impending crisis in the Union, and Mr. Corwin, of Ohio, moved the appointment of a Committee of thirty-three, to which all matters relating thereto, and others.——In the House, the Homestead Bill, and the Military Academy Bill, and the Naval Academy Appropriation bills, were passed without debate. After referring many matters to appropriate Committees, the House agreed to print standing committees the House adjourned.

On Thursday, December 6, in the Senate, Senator Latham presented a memorial in favor of a daily overland mail to California. Senator Wilson moved the reference of the President's Message as relates to the present agitated condition of the country, and the grievances complained of to the above-named Committee of thirteen. Senator Seward moved to amend the motion by referring the message to a committee to be instructed to inquire whether any additional legislation should be recommended, the sphere of federal authority and duty will its necessary for the protection and security of the rights of persons and property, both of the part by this; and that the said committee be also instructed to report whether it is expedient or is deemed expedient to propose an amendment or amendments to the Constitution of the United States, to insure a prompt and full protection to the rights and property of citizens of every State in the Union, and to secure the equality of the States, and insure the equal rights of the citizens aforesaid under the federal Constitution, and for the purpose.——In the House, Mr. Morris of Pennsylvania gave notice that on Monday he would introduce a resolution declaring the Union perpetual. THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Hon. James Buchanan, President of the United States, sent in his Message, at the opening of Congress, on the 3d. North with Southern institutions has at last led to its natural consequences. Secession—Peace, however, it is hoped yet be restored. The election of Lincoln does not of itself justify secession. The only ground of any pretext for the act has ever passed Congress that is both of the South have been violated by Northern legislation. The Dred Scott decision proves that the territories are and remain open to slavery. The Message protested, and says that the only legal injury inflicted upon the South has been the passage by Northern States of laws nullifying the Fugitive Slave Law. If these are not repealed, the South will be justified in dissolving the Confederacy. The Message goes on to say that the Union being in its nature perpetual, no State can lawfully secede except for the causes mentioned. No acts, however, right every State enjoys the right of revolution. The Federal Government is one of delegated, not, at present, in South Carolina, he can not perform that duty, for no power has been delegated to him; he can collect no revenue, but nothing more. In his opinion Congress has no power to coerce a State into submission. And as it is, it had the power it would be unwise to exert it. The Message concludes with a plan suggested to the patriotism of the South to forbear in the purpose of Disunion, and recommends an amendment to the Constitution. The explanatory amendment might be confined to the final settlement of the slavery question, and to the following effect three special points:

1. To recognize the recognition of the right of property in slaves in the States where it now exists or may hereafter exist.

2. To protect this property during this right in all the common Territories throughout their territorial existence, and until they shall be admitted into the Union as States, with or without slavery, as their constitutions may prescribe.

3. To recognize the right of the master to take his fugitive slave, who has escaped from one State to another, to and use it "delivered up" in all cases in which the duty of the Fugitive Slave Law enacted for this purpose, together with a declaration that the laws have imparting or obstructing this right are violations of the Constitution, and are consequently null and void.

Passing to our foreign relations, the President observes that our relations with Great Britain are friendly, and Clayton-Bulwer disputes and the right of search question have not been settled, but are now in a train which is under discussion. France is also friendly, and has admitted our claims to the Island of Navassa. Spain and Portugal can not be seized in France for military service. After a long debate, the Senate adjourned. In the House, after the President reiterates his argument in favor of the purchase of Cuba, and declares that Chile are satisfactory, the Chinese have paid an indemnity of $700,000 for American claims, and the parties injured are being paid. The Treaty of Tien-tsin is fairly carried out by the Chinese. The treaty with Japan has not yet ratified. Mexico our relations are very complicated; treaties are before the Senate for the adjustment which may improve them. But the condition of that republic is very disheartening. No stable government established in Kansas and Utah. The expenses of Government are being reduced; but the income is falling off, and the debt is increasing. [Details of the finances will be found in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.] The African Slave-trade has been suppressed by the Navy, and no slaver has been imported to the United State. The President concluded with the recommendation that the Pacific Railroad be built, that a new tariff be framed, and that additional duties be imposed duties, that Gonsalvo Vanderbilt be compensated for carrying the mail without a contract, and that the people of Kansas be relieved from the present famine.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Hon. Howell Cobb, Secretary of the Treasury, reports that on 30th June last the public debt amounted to $44,910,677, including $17,734,000 of Treasury notes. On 30th June, 1861, the same debt is computed to $68,784,000, including $28,153,000 of Treasury notes. On 30th June, 1862, the public debt will be $80,000,000, including $30,000,000 of Treasury notes. Since then coming into office the present Administration, and have pointed him out to raise the money to do so the Government has sold $19,000,000 of 6 per cents, and 8 per cents. From the larges of $8,591,000 of this $16,000,000 have paid up under its first call; the latest column of the remaining $3,000,000 are delinquent, and decline to take up their bonds. The Secretary says that the Government does not have the stock sold for their account. By January 1, over a million and a half will be required to be paid on account on the public debt; and between this and then large sums will be required to be paid on account of interest. To redeem over five millions of maturing Treasury notes. The Committee of Ways and Means is therefore considering no such revision as the one which has now overtaken the Senate. Senator, in authorizing the issue of $17,000,000 of 6 per cents to redeem these Treasury notes, and provide for the expected deficiencies of revenue. Of these, as we said, the Department disposed, on the 23d of November, of $16,000,000. The Secretary says that the amount required for the next so far as the remaining $17,000,000 are concerned, will be $3,000,000 besides this to meet the loans on the 1st of January. For the purpose, in order to give a higher rank to these Treasury notes, he asks for authority to issue for their engagements. The current expenditure for the year 1859–60 was $69,346,674, including $4,605,000 of post-office deficiency and $3,000,000 of The Secretary estimates that the expense of the two succeeding years will be $69,000,000 each year. The estimated revenue for these two years are $65,388,000 for the year 1860–61, and $66,000,000 for 1861–62. This, however, is irrespective of the present revulsion, which cripples trade, and consequently the revenue. Hence the Government's concern. The following tables will show the Expenditures and the Revenue from Customs for the last ten years:

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

Hon. John B. Floyd reports that the strength of the army is the same as it was last year, and that it has been entirely employed in protecting the Texas frontier, and in the defence of Kiowas on the Kansas River by Lieut. Col. Sumner, in that of the Sioux by Colonel A. S. Hoyt, and it is recommended that the Indian Bureau be under the direction of the War Office. The Secretary recommends the establishment of a Fort Buchanan, on Fort Benson, on the Missouri, has been tried by troops, and has been found unsuitable. An improvement in the Yuma which would render it only second to a Pacific railroad. It is recommended that a survey be made in use by the Government troops be relied; that fresh provision be made for the Military Academy; that a national armory be established; and that the army be supplied with breech-loading rifles. The Secretary says that a Wood Fight has been prolonged for five years. A steamer is wanted on Puget's Sound. The rest of the report refers to matters of detail.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

Hon. Isaac Toucey, Secretary of the Navy, reports that the number of officers and men employed to maintain the sailing vessels of the United States navy recommend the appointment of 1,000 apprentices to be taken annually, but do not recommend the application of steam to the brigs, sloops, and frigates. The recommend the increase of the navy, and appropriations for the repair of vessels and the construction of new ones. The Coast Survey employs fifty-five midshipmen graduated in June, and 90 were admitted. The Naval Academy at Annapolis has been successfully conducted with vigor; during the year 12 slavers have been seized, and 313 Africans rescued. The African squadron is commanded by Flag-officer Joseph M. Jarvis, has consisted, during the year, of the Saratoga, Portsmouth, Constellation, Jamestown, Sidney, Dolphin, Marion, Vincennes, St. Louis, Pembroke, Preble, Pawnee, Iroquois, Mohican, Wyandotte, Crusader, and Mystic steamers. The Brazil squadron, under the command of Flag-officer Joshua R. Sands, has consisted of the Roanoke, Lancaster, Lapidia, Perry, Bainbridge, and Pulaski. The Mediterranean squadron, commanded by Flag-officer William Mervine Bell, has consisted of the Ribault, Macedonian, Marion, and Dale. The African squadron, under the command of Flag-officer William Inman, has consisted of the Constitution, Vincennes, Saratoga, Constellation, Marion, Mahican, Saratoga, Sumpter, and Mystic. The East India squadron, under the command of Flag-officer J. R. Montgomery, has consisted of the Lancaster, Saranac, Hartford, St. Mary's, Portsmouth, Levant, Preble, Supply, Narragansett, Fredonia, and Warren. The Gulf Coast squadron, commanded by Flag-officer W. B. Shubrick, has comprised the Hartford, Germantown, Saginaw, Water Witch, and Wyandotte. The report further includes to the Japanese visit, and the voyage of the Niagara with the Prince of Wales; of the Lieutenant Strain, on the exploration of the Parana by Commander Page; to the exploration of the Dead Sea by Lieut. Lynch; to the Paraguay Expedition on the report of Lieut. Gilliss; to the expedition of Lieutenant Herndon's survey of the coast of Japan, etc. The expenditures for the naval service during the year ending June 30, 1860, were $11,677,251, a decrease of about $3,000,000 from the preceding year. For the current year the estimates are $11,710,195; for the year following, $11,460,195.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Hon. J. Thompson, Secretary of the Interior, reports that during the year ending 30th June last, and the quarter ending 30th September last, 16,365,351 acres were purchased by the Government, and 1,949,760 sold. The Secretary approves the present land system. After referring to some local matters, he alludes to the controversy with Great Britain respecting lands in Washington Territory claimed by the late Hudson's Bay Company, and recommends a final survey and settlement. The Indians have generally been at peace with us, with the exception of the Snakes and the Kiowas. The colonization system has proved a failure. The number of United States pensioners is now 11,384, drawing $1,001,618 from Government annually. During the year, 5033 patents were issued, and 541 caveats filed. The census progresses satisfactorily, and the returns show rapid increase in population and wealth. Means should be taken to ascertain the amount of the domestic trade between States. Legislation is needed to obviate the expense and inconvenience now imposed on the assembling of the people against the slave-trade; it is difficult, however, to suggest a change in the mode of the prejudice existing among the people on the subject. Attention is made to the representation of the District of Columbia in Congress, and to the necessity for new court accommodations and a new jail. The Post-Office Department, South Pass, and the Wagon-road is now completed. The surveys of the boundaries between the United States and Texas and Mexico are progressing satisfactorily.

REPORT OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

Hon. J. Holt, Postmaster-General, reports that, on 30th June last, there were in this country 28,492 post-offices, together 880,804 miles long; that the annual transportation of mail was 74,124,714 miles, at a cost of $5,387,000—being a decrease from the year previous of 9 per cent. in transportation and 1 per cent. in cost. The number of post-offices in the United States is 28,498, a decrease of 41 for the past year. The following shows the receipts from the revenue, expenditure, and deficiency of the Post-Department for the last eight years:

Years.	Expenditure.	Revenue.	Deficiencies.
1853.	5,212,166 00	$3,540,714 70	$1,671,451 30
1854.	5,871,424 12	4,305,596 23	1,571,827 89
1855.	6,349,753 57	5,042,116 17	1,307,637 40
1856.	6,814,117 39	5,620,921 66	1,193,195 73
1857.	7,924,260 31	6,430,091 71	1,494,168 60
1858.	12,771,626 56	8,186,192 86	4,594,343 70
1859.	14,962,461 74	7,968,484 66	6,993,977 08
1860.	14,874,772 39	9,218,607 49	5,656,164 90
1861.	13,600,000 00	9,676,171 00	3,923,829 00
1862.	14,950,353 29	10,338,194 60	4,568,690 69

The aggregate amount of postage on the United States and European mails last year was $1,370,401, rather more than half of which was paid by the United States. With the Pacific States we have no line which has a mail contract. Commodore Vanderbilt carries the only steamer; he proves from the President to recommend that Congress reimburse him. The loss sustained by the Post-Office Department thereby who post unpaid letters has now ceased. The penny post has gone into operation in 49 cities. Hereafter the Department is involved in a lawsuit with a private carrier, which will be a judgment in the form of a primary Court; and in small towns the rate of pay referred—and no allowance is made for wear and tear. Another legislation is recommended on these points. The system of letting out mail routes to a bidder, is open to additional security, and tempts knaves. Reference is made to the failure of Messrs. Butterfield, Wasson, and Co., $170,000 of the public money is unaccounted for. There is the necessity for a uniform rate of two cents for short distances, and for others ten cents. There has been a loss to the purchase of land for Post-offices at New York and Philadelphia, and at some minor matters.

THE LEGISLATURE OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

This Legislature has declared it incapable to fill the vacancies in the United States Senate. The House has passed a bill authorizing the Governor to call into service 25,000 volunteers. The Assembly sold the whole 350 Infantry companies, 20 cavalry, 13 artillery, and 62 rifle companies, and 13 battalions. By another bill, 10 regiments, and five divisions. Mr. McGowan said the total military force was 40,000. The declaration of secession in the Convention has taken place.

A bill was introduced on 7th, in the Legislature, providing holidays to be observed thereafter in the State on June 8, the anniversary of the battle of Fort Moultrie; Good Friday, Christmas, January 1, Thanksgiving and Fast Days, ordered by the Fourth of July.

THE LEGISLATURE OF GEORGIA.

In the Legislature of Georgia the bill authorizing the suppression of the sympathy for the Black Republicans passed over the Governor's veto. Resolution declaring Georgia out of the Union was laid on the table. Resolutions calling for a Convention of the Southern States were also lost. Georgia will probably act alone.

Mr. Fulton, of Columbus, offered resolutions in the House on 7th, requesting the Governor to call upon the States to propose to the Congress of the United States the appointment of Commissioners to be a part of the body which shall determine duty it shall be to provide for a peaceable dissolution of the Union, and for the equitable adjustment of the property between the two sections.

THE LEGISLATURE OF MISSISSIPPI.

The Mississippi Legislature adjourned on the 30th ult. The Convention bill, with some unimportant amendments, still authorizing the Government to appoint commissioners to co-operate with other slaveholding States, was passed unanimously. The State law and Non-Importation Slave act were failed to be in operation in time for the action of the Convention meets on the 7th of January. In a great speech Hon. Wm. L. Sharkey declared against secession and the simultaneous adoption of a Federal Constitution, and the Southern Confederacy. Senators to the Congress of the new republic and appoints electors for President of the Southern confederacy.

THE CONVENTION IN TEXAS.

A Committee of citizens of Texas petitioned Governor Houston to convene the Legislature. The Governor responded that, owing to the proposed measure as unwise, he could not call the Legislature together. It is a majority of the citizens of the State petitioned for it, he could not stand in their way. Since then the difficulties which have been urged, in a circular letter signed by a number of gentlemen, to the effect that a Convention in the 5th of January, said Convention to assemble at the capital on the Fourth Monday in the same month. The movement appears to meet with popular sanction.

THE CONVENTION IN ALABAMA AND FLORIDA.

A dispatch, dated Montgomery, December 4, says: "The secession movement is steadily but quietly progressing in Alabama. The people of the counties will elect delegates without opposition. In the others the fight will be confined to the secession candidates, and the vote of the State will show a majority in favor of separate State action. The latter will be largely in the majority."

A dispatch, dated Tallahassee, Florida, Tuesday, December 1, says: "The Florida Legislature unanimously passed the Convention bill. It meets on the 3d of January."

HOW SOUTH CAROLINA IS TO BE SECEDED.

The Herald correspondent says: "I learn from a gentleman who is closely from Washington, that there is a certain degree of dignity and moderation will characterize the action of this State in withdrawing from the Union, which believes she will surely do. That State will send a commissioner to Washington to consult with the Government. The letter will not receive such consideration who will then urge that the commissioner from the people of that State, and the terms upon which South Carolina proposes to go out. The commissioner will also go to the capitals of both Houses. The gentleman from whom I learn the above assures me that the Legislature of South Carolina is about equally divided between passing a bill for an early day on which to secede, and a bill leaving the time of secession subject to the action of other States."

SENATOR MASON FOR DISSOLVING.

In a letter which has been published, Senator Mason says:

"The disruption of the Federal Union, thus imminent, etc., I should more properly say, actual, is a great and permanent event; and in considering, therefore, how it may secure the Government of Virginia to the end, we have to that event as a material, if not a controlling element in the deliberations. In the first place is many, and most probably will, force upon the Federal Government the settlement between it and the several States of the question of the right of secession. If that right is denied, a new and paramount issue will be made between the States and the Federal power, which will be presented to the Virginia Convention in advance. One thing is very clear—Virginia no more than any other Southern State will not be passive she should say attempt be made, by force, to reduce such seceding State or States to subjection.

"In the next place, it is to my mind equally clear, that Virginia, as the greatest opponent of the Union on the slavery question, the objection will necessarily carry with it the abandonment of the Union by the States whose slavery destiny it is to continue such; unless, under a returning sense of justice, parties in the Northern mind, all will remain on such securities for the future to will establish the most essential interest in the maintenance of laws to whom it pertains."

SECESSION HUNTER FOR SECESSION.

Senator Hunter has lately written a letter advocating the right of secession, and declaring that he thinks the new guaranties are at once given by the North to the slavery interests, will be sufficient to secure the rights of the Union. He then naturally proceeds to inquire with what "new guaranties" he can be met, and makes the interesting subject he expresses himself as follows:

"I am free to say that I doubt as to what ought to be the course of Virginia and the other Southern Border States. The Republican party will, I believe, they would confederate as equals, and with those whose population was homogeneous with their own, and whose institutions like their own. If they united with the North under such circumstances, they would constitute a helpless minority in association with States whose population was not homogeneous with their own, and whose institutions and interests as different and hostile. They would be treated as inferiors, and their interests would be sacrificed to the unprincipled interest which they would have formed. Their only safety for their peculiar property in slaves, not only in the Territories, but in the States, and the right of the South united to its own concerns, or the Middle States, and to have their property protected by the laws between them, and have the laws respected, and we say to our Northern brethren, 'Give us this,' and if you are not honest bonds, we have a great stake in this Union and this Constitution. We have contributed largely to the wealth of your cities, the fog of Union, and we will ever march under the flag of the Union cheerfully, and with our blood ever during, and plundering of each other, is the best we are willing to give. But if you refuse us these, we will not have, yet more of conservatism, and put down fanaticism North, and then we will unite with you again, and live and act deliberately, and let our action be harmonious and consistent.

HON. ALEC STEPHENS AGAINST DISUNION.

Mr. Stephens writes to a friend in this manner: "If the worst comes to the worst, as it may, and our State has to go out, I will go with it. But I am not prepared to say that our people should be united cordially in this course. This, I am decidedly opposed to, and have been all the time I indicated. But candor compels me to say that I am not a submissionist that our rights are to be trampled on, and wrongs be redressed, in the Union. If this can be done, I am for remaining in. I look, however, to the acts of a majority of our people. If, after making an effort, we fail, then all can go out together. I am decidedly for adopting the last resort—the ultima ratio regum.

"I pray to Heaven I may not be driven into opposition to the ultimate result. When this Union is disrupted, it will be necessary to meet it as a fixed fact, and the prospect of good government afterward. At the North, the conservative men will rally to the support of the Union; we shall be better off at the South will depend upon many things. We can do well or ill, as we will. I am for the preservation of Revolution as it was there started from constitutional liberty, and begin there. That is our purpose and objects, seldom and then."

SECESSIONISTS PREPARING FOR A COMPROMISE.

A dispatch to the Herald, dated Washington, December 4, says:

"The Republican Senators canvassed yesterday, and were unanimously of opinion that no compromise whatever with men or States who are in the act of violating the Constitution and laws of their country. Some of them say they have appealed to the country upon the principles of the Chicago platform, indorsed by the Northern Legislatures and their principles by electing Lincoln and Hamlin, in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution. They declare their intention to avoid all cutting discussion, and to maintain the rights of the people of the Union, and do all they can to aid the President of the United States in executing the laws of the country and quelling whomever violated.

"The unanimous opposition of Thurlow Weed was unequivocally announced as unwise, impolitic, unjust, and anti-Republican, as a whole and in part."

Mr. Seward was called upon to know if he indorsed the views of Mr. Weed in the above dispatch, and Mr. Seward replied that he knew nothing concerning Mr. Weed's opinions. He recognized only the Constitution, in print, and that he did not indorse them.

The following is the vote in the Senates, such as Seward, Fessenden, Trumbull, Chandler, and Wilkinson, hold a Republican, as a whole and in part, according to pronouncing the President's Message a weak, namby-pamby affair, and unworthy of the support of the party:

THE CROTON WATER STOPPED.

A serious accident has occurred to the water which supply the Croton water to the city. About 11 o'clock, on Thursday night, the embankment of the Croton Reservoir was broken by the enormous weight of materials which it has been gradually receiving its contents, and by the time the Chief Engineer of the Croton Department arrived, at 1 A.M., the water in the lower half of the reservoir was exhausted. The damage was repaired by Saturday.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

It is now certain that the seven Presidential Electors chosen on the Pacific slope have cast their votes for Lincoln and seventy-three of them chosen this side of the Rocky Mountains, in the aggregate. The precise vote by States may be succinctly summed up as follows:

CONSERVATIVE BANQUET IN RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.

A dispatch dated Richmond, Virginia, December 6, says: "According to previous announcement, the Union men of Richmond gave a public dinner to-day, and a grand dinner at the Exchange Hotel and Ballard House last night. Many guests were made, expressing conservative Union sentiments, and opposing secession from existing causes. Speeches were also made expressing a desire to secede be committed, then they would shoulder their muskets, knapsacks, and blankets in defence of their rights. It was one of the grandest jollifications that has taken place on the occasion, and the last public banquet at 12 o'clock this morning.

"At the banquet strong speeches were made in favor of the Union, and generally favoring a Convention of the Border States, Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, and advocated force, if the laws could not be upheld without it. The sentiment was a decided one."

NEGRO INSURRECTION IN KENTUCKY.

A dispatch, dated Louisville, Kentucky, Saturday, December 1, says: "Intelligence just received from Columbia, Adair County, that Negro Insurrection and one white man, their leader, have been hung by the citizens of Russellville, for attempting to raise a negro insurrection. No further particulars have yet come to hand."

APPALLING MURDER.

One of the most appalling and terrible murders that ever was enacted occurred in the city on Friday morning, the 30th ult., at No. 5 Bond-st. The victim, an old widow lady, named Sarah Shanks, who kept a fancy goods and millinery store on the above number, was found dead in her bedroom, at the rear of the store, with her throat cut from ear to ear, nearly to the neck, and face mashed to a jelly almost. Robbery seems to have been the motive for the commission of the horrible deed, judging from the unsolicited condition of the apartments. The police have thus far been able to trace out the assassin, but it is hoped that some clue will be afforded to the perpetrator before many days.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE EMPEROR IN SCOTLAND.

We take the following from Punch of Wednesday, November 21, the following: "Yesterday morning the Queen's Highland guard, and also the Prince of Wales's, and the horses, and the horse and grounds of Abbotsford. Like all the gentlemen connected with the Imperial Majesty's Journey to Melrose was kept strictly secret, so much so that, when the train left Perth, at 7:30 A.M., not a single member of persons ran to the Glencoe side of the general premises, in the expectation that Her Majesty was about to take her departure for Hamilton Palace. The Imperial party traveled in a Scotch saloon carriage, the ordinary passenger-train, leaving Edinburgh at 11.25 A.M., and reaching Melrose at 1.30 P.M., in a manner about as much as all the stations on the homeward journey, however, were kept clear, and crowds of people, who had got wind of the Royal visit, were assembled at the leading points of the line. Her Majesty, who was looking well, and evidently quite pleased with the fine weather which had favored the interesting visit, Her Majesty was eagerly greeted, and perhaps received a more than usually hearty welcome, which the railway officials had in vain tried to prevent from receiving the Royal visitors. The line of Her Majesty's departure from Edinburgh is not yet made known, but it is supposed that it will be through the valley of Buccleuch at Dalkeith Palace, and to-morrow (Thursday) leave Douglas Hall for Hamilton Palace."

THE FINANCIAL SITUATION.

The financial situation underwent an important change on the 15th, and a considerable boon conferred upon the City, which the Bank of England lends £9,000,000 sterling in the Bank Parliament Act, which has been passed with a view to an equal amount. The arrangement has created a feeling of confidence, and the advance is ceased to be required.

The Times City article hopes the arrangement will terminate the perplexing consideration of the money market, and leads the early resolution of the Bank rate of discount.

FRANCE.

OFFICIAL MOVEMENTS.

It was rumored that Count de Morny was going to Rome on a special mission with an autograph letter from the Emperor. It was also stated that Count Persigny contemplates retiring from the London Embassy, to be succeeded by Count Walewski.

ITALY.

THE SIEGE OF GAETA.

At latest dates the siege of Gaeta continued. The batteries of Cuspucini and Santa Agata had been placed in a position which would soon silence the place. The Bechonnets bombarded the suburbs on the 11th. The Piedmontese continued to fight resolutely, but the defences in the staff officers was increasing.

Colonel Dunford had received a battalion of Chasseurs de Pinthousiase.

Further resistance by the Bourbon troops was paralyzed by the inconsolation of chiefs and the confusion which prevailed. Negotiations were, however, progressing on the subject.

GARIBALDI AT HOME.

The Gazette di Torino gives us some particulars of Garibaldi's landing at Caprera. The General Garibaldi has arrived at Caprera. He appears extremely happy in the first place, because he has the management of domestic affairs at Naples into the hands of the King gelicuscus; secondly, because he has got rid from the importunate petitions with which he was pestered. He speaks with the greatest of his regained freedom, and he has taken no less to extend it even to his three war-horses, which he with his own hands unsaddled and unbridled and released freely to run about the country the moment he set foot on his own isle. So eager was the Dictator to be free from the cares of State that he with his own hands loosened the crowning cords of the vessel which was to waft him from Naples to Caprera. He appears, however, the greatest delight in the bosom of Dalj, and that he calls his "dear Virgo Emonuel."

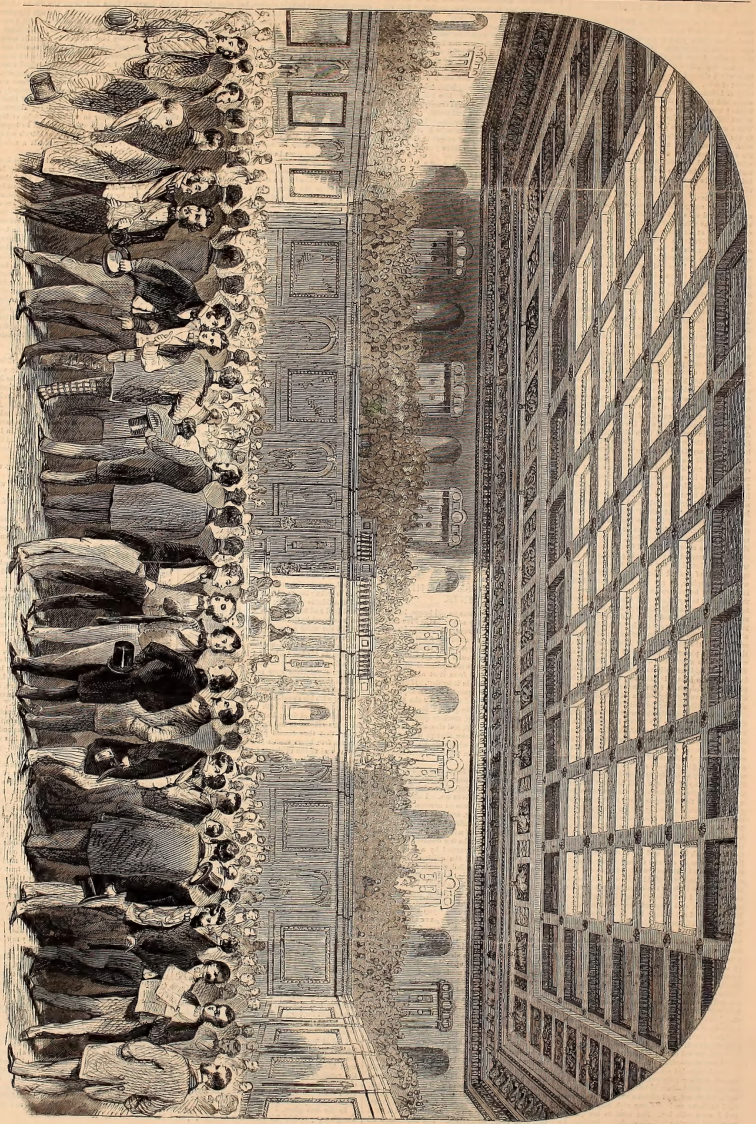
The Monument of Genoa relates the following curious anecdote: "When Garibaldi arrived at Caprera, he was received by the whole population, and the festivities were changed. Instead of the story desert he had left, he now found a house, and the island covered with plantations, with shady groves and spacious avenues. It looked as if a magician had been there, and struck the ground with his wand, building astore habitants to hasten her treasures on the shore, and to plant the island with trees. Garibaldi gazed and wondered, and at last, turning to the magician who stood before him, on entering which he had left a desert, he exclaimed, 'Are you the wife of Garibaldi?' and hung the portrait of his friend Victor Emanuel, who had been kept in reserve to account in order to prepare this surprise for him."

GARIBALDI AND VENETIA.

Garibaldi has addressed an important letter relative to his Venetian campaign, and rumors are current in Paris concerning negotiations for the purchase of Venetia.

GARIBALDI AT THE HOSPITALS.

The following extracts from a private letter to the editor of the Medical Times and Gazette, written at Naples the day recently visited Naples, will be read with interest. The writer is one of the most eminent of the younger surgeons of the day:



"A few days ago I was one of a party which went down to Caserta to visit the military hospital, where the wounded Garibaldians are being accommodated. The King of Naples walked in the gardens of the palace, where we were to commence our visit accidentally, and we had the honor of being rude shutting. Among these was no less a personage than Garibaldi himself. He was in the act of about to be conducted by a couple of aides, who led with her a large number of wounded and sick soldiers, when the King of Naples, learning that the former orders that all persons should visit the hospital, he immediately offered to escort her thither himself. A few minutes after, the whole party were in attendance to see Garibaldi drive off with an English lady and her daughter, who had come down from Naples to visit the hospital. I was perched on the box. After a ten minutes' drive we arrived at the hospital, which is a magnificent building, with the wards are too small, and the ventilation is bad. Garibaldi was received with cheers. The crowd outside knew that the General was there; they could not see him, but they knew that he was in the building above about. It was a most affecting sight to see the tenderness with which the warlike-looking man approached the sick bed. Every one was visited in turn, and he had a few words of encouragement for each patient. Then the rough hand so kindly on the fevered brows of the most suffering, and the eyes which darted from their eyes, the military day, and the air was very carefully exclusive. the patients grew to a man, and when the visit terminated, it was open, was that air too freely admitted was apt to cause fever in the wounded men. Of course there was no attempt at such a profound observation, but after a few minutes Garibaldi himself noticed the want of ventilation. He was having suggested to him the propriety of doing so. Before the visit terminated, the windows were thrown open, although the most of them having been sent some days before, and the air was very much improved. Garibaldi at each patient a dollar to purchase wine, and then left. Before I saw the one year follow very uncomfortable with a dry dressing, the wounds healing, and the general desire to be properly dressed, and made some observations about using water for dressings, by which the surgeons were astonished. He asked particularly if they used chloroform during operations, and was answered that they had used it in the case of amputations. After the visit to the common soldiers being finished, Garibaldi went on to the wards where the officers were lying wounded. He kissed some of them affectionately, and shook hands cordially with all, and, accepting every one's invitation to join my wants, etc. Not one of them complained to him; they were all grateful for the care they had received, and there were many things required for their comfort: above all, night attendance."

HAVANA.

MELANCHOLY SUICIDE.

The Havana correspondent of the New Orleans Crescent writes a melancholy story: "A young Spaniard, who has inherited you in my last letter that early in the present month a resident of Havana, named Don Ramon Pinto, Count of Soumoviar, had thrown herself from the balcony of the second story, and at the end of the house in Obispo de Armas, and thus committed suicide. I had heard she had been threatened to be forged, and was told that she was a nine-field of the sugar estate, which led her to commit the act. I was told that she had been driven to it by the misconduct of her family of the Count, my curiosity was excited to learn the cause of the rash act, and I determined that I would lend to being re-acquainted with the facts. I have done so, and now give you the result. A young, poor, but respectable man, named Don Ramon Pinto, was employed by Count Pinto, the country, last summer, and had fallen in love with a daughter of the Count, who returned his love with equal ardor. The Count and Countess, however, refused their consent to the union of the daughter with a man who was not an equal to the Captain-General. According to Spanish law, a daughter cannot marry without the consent of her parents, which led to her committing suicide. She was the lady's maid, I am told, of the Soiorita," had from her infancy been treated with great kindness. The idea of being compelled to work in the field, rather than to remain with her mistress, and the thought that she was not to see Don Ramon, drove her frantic, and she threw herself from the balcony, as I have stated. Count Pinto is a wealthy man, and has a family of children, and he has always

A RECORD OF THE DAY.

ASSEMBLING OF CONGRESS, HALL OF REPRESENTATIVES, WASHINGTON CITY, DECEMBER 3, 1860.

IN THE INDIAN SUMMER.

THIS is the anniversary of a period in my life when in one year I sprang from youth to full manhood—from callow years to the rich experience and ripe fruition of older men. If incidents mark lives, then is mine deeply marked.

It was the Indian Summer of the season for that time which rimmed my life about with a shining circle of love. Every day that I passed in the society of Leonè, every bright morning that dawned warm and lustrous in the east, clasped tighter the bonds I wore for her, and bound closer the chain whose links I follow'd now with pride and joy. These words, then, are only the testimony I bear to the memory of a pure, true-hearted, noble woman. I lived at her mother's, and heard there the early years when all life seems spring-time, when birds and blossoms continually sing, and when sadly bloom. Away to the east the river shouted boisterously in its course; it joined its bridegroom, the sea.

I shouted too.

Along its margin the crimson maples and the saffron-tinged oaks put on their royal robes, and waited for the wind to woo them. They laughed with delight as it came, and welcomed it with tremulous shiverings; then laid all their particolored ornaments in its lap. So all nature wedded. The sere, yearning Autumn in the mild heavens, bloomed large and lustrous like a mellow peach: it married the purple mountain-tops at sunset and dusk of day. The mirrory flights of wild-fowl streamed in long ranges through the air, and, with new companions, sought warmer climates. The neighbors, near and far, sent up their sons and daughters to the altar, and they went crimson and smiling away.

Through all the changes of the year I asked myself, is this to be my lot too? I asked it of the wind and of the sea; but the wind only whistled, and the river only gurgled low and sadly. Unfortunately, the evening society of my lady, the freshness of her heart, and the sweetness of her nature, added to the plainness of her face, made a deep impression on me, and time strengthened this feeling, made me look upon marriage with her as the highest of all earthly destinies. The fact of a teaching experience of a few months rather deepened than subtracted from the views I had formed; on the contrary, the evening I left, honest, and say love—the love I had for Leonè deepened, until the day of return was gladly welcomed. On reaching home I found another inmate; he was introduced as an "old friend." As I never had the right to question Leonè as to her intimacies and associates, I could not do it in this case; so, with increasing alarm, I stood aloof and looked on. "This old friend" made large strides and came often. At last he went away, as I thought, finally. He had been intimate, but not tender; friendly, but not ardent. He was, in short, but the conventional old friend.

As there seemed no possible impediment in the way, why should I not assume my strength against that of the old friend's? Where he then was commonplace, to my mind, it became brilliant; where he was gloomy, I talked with sentiment, always to my mind; and where he had been sentimental and tender, there was I irresistible and making rapid headway. I do not now remember that I ever struck the hand in friendship, after the manner of modern writers, and became surely with the old friend for Leonè's regard, or that I made pledge or promise of any sort. We went upon the way in the world, and I upon mine. His road, I said inwardly to myself, because of his indifference to Leonè, lay through valleys and flat plains; but I, high in the conscious appreciation of her truth and purity, was a visitor of mountain-tops and of sunny summits.

I remember peculiarly the sweet smile of assent this lady, Leonè, gave me when I proposed, one evening, to read the stories of Charles Dickens aloud. At that encouragement we began those books, and were enamored our prejudices. We were ended. As the rapid days and nights sped away, so also flew the year and the season—so also went the glow of the spring, now dead, but—until the genial lamp of the sun should no more mellowness nor yet brightness upon the scenes, striking world; until the harlequin forest shed its variegated garb and moaned piteously for its levity. With the outer change came also an inner one for me. The old friend left no sign or trail behind him of his presence, and I called the whole hope of life mine. The Leonè of my one idle whim had no amusement, and look back, I will say that some years in life are so sharply cut and defined as the face of a statue. How blank and cold the features of that old friend stand revealed! and oh, how warm and rudely ruffled are the associations with the one over him! I did a fatal thing; I overrated my own strength, and despised that of the enemy. But as I said, the days were live in anticipation of happiness, I fully resolved, each day, to hear from Leonè what question she would ask me—and the whole lifetime that lay twisting and turning in all its many windings at her control. So I said, one evening, when Leonè rallied my sober appearance (I was revolving the matter then as usual), and questioned me as to its cause—I said that it was because of the love I bore her.

She had been sewing previously. The needle stopped in the seam, the thread, twisted about her forefinger, hung in idle loops. "You must not say that," she said, slowly, and looking gravely but tenderly at me.

"And why," I spoke, "why may I not say it?" (Oh, old friend! old friend! is your shadow near?)

"Did you not see my old friend B——?"

"I saw him—yes."

Leonè regarded me steadfastly and earnestly a second, then carefully put her work aside, and took me by the hand—how its touch ran from my heart up to my brain, and with its velvet clasp thrilled and clung to me! "Come with me," she said; and I went with her. She went to her private room, and entering it, "take my fathers seat," she commanded.

I crossed the sacred threshold she lacked the door and put the key in her pocket, saying, "You see what confidence I place in you."

I, dumb with sorrow, amazement, and I know not what countless emotions, could only feebly smile. A fire blazed upon the hearth, and longnecked toilet-bottles stood grim sentries upon the dressing-table. The shadows of the feeble flames made fierce lunges at each other. Leonè went to a drawer, opened it, and took out a picture of the old friend evidently executed a few years before he was before my hands clasped it. She put it into my hands, not with a relinquishment of cruelty, but with a sentiment of implicit faith and love.

"This fate"—so my lady spoke—"is that of my destined husband. We have been betrothed now so long that it is a matter of course to the family, and we never speak of it. Have you never heard it?"

As I shall be one day judged," I said, "I never heard of it;" and I rose to leave the room. "Pardon me, Leonè, my business is ended."

Leonè came hurriedly forward. "I am my own mistress," she said, "and my husband acknowledges in me brass me. Before you go, and we part, let me tell you how high and noble your conduct has been. Let me tell you that to each one—" and what a proud and a happy thing it is for me to know that such an one has spoken to me as you have spoken." It happened very low. "To each dear——, your mind and heart, though it may not forget me, will say the opposite to me, and will be nothing all hopes that may have been formed."

I said that I was it. "You will yet be happier with another love than you ever could be with me."

Leonè saw higher than I; but in that hour and from that time my age was far greater than the sum of many years. Leonè died long since, and the last words. It was parables which I was leaving—why might I not look back? The lady stood leaning with one hand upon the arm-chair. The fire yet burned; the blaze yet flickered: but oh! under the white robe of the dead, how cold and leaped again into flame! As the dear, pitying face stood there I thought the sad, silent room held no fairer picture in all its dim recesses than it. So, slowly, I was withdrawing; but her voice sounded and bade me stop. She came toward me, and the rustle of her dress was like the flutter of wings as I, in a trance, heard her say, "Because you leave them and him for me, I love you more." And Leonè kissed me stroud upon the forehead.

Then I went out.

I bear the stamp of purity upon my brow. Look, all men, and see the seal a pure and true-hearted woman has set upon it. Now and henceforth I wear a talisman against the fiery darts and deceits of the devil. The Indian Summer yet blooms; the leaves still fade and fall; the skies are mellow and serene; within the arches of the woods the nuts patter softly upon the leaves; the fruits of the year hang out their golden and purple lamps. But the summer of my heart the long, long days I spent with Leonè hang ripening for the autumn of my life.

THE OLD HOUSE IN THE FIVE POINTS.

NOT long ago there was an old house, in one of the most filthy and noisy streets in the Five Points, which had not been known for years to have its doors opened or its door unbarred for thirty years. Its walls had become gray with shaby age. Not a glass in the window-frames had all been broken out, and the shutters were spattered with mud. Several high trees grew in front of the house, on a step or voice was heard in it by day. If by chance a venturesome urchin peeped in at a keyhole, he beheld a very, dusky room, filled to the roof with mysterious solitude of the place. No children sat upon its window-sills, no women gossiped on the stoop as they passed it by, and clasped their infants closer, for every one knew though few said that murder had been done in that house, and that upon its floor was a stain that had never come out in all that time.

In those days, nearly forty years since, I was a young and almost unknown lawyer, and, in fact, had never yet pleaded in a criminal court. Indeed, her practice had been given me. I used to feel a little out of spirits at times on account of the slow progress I was making in the world, and was not thinking fit rather a tedious affair. Sitting one evening in this frame of mind, and with a sort of contempt, my position, the door of my office was brought forth, I was startled by a low, hurried knock at the door. On my command entered a young woman, closely veiled, though, as I saw afterward, of considerable beauty. She seemed greatly agitated, and on raising her veil, I was surprised to wait until the words which her trembling lips could hardly form became intelligible.

"Sir," said she, "I am told you are a lawyer; I can you in the court to-day: save him, oh, save him from conviction and from a felon's doom!"

I begged her to be calm, and to be more explicit. I had, it was true, been in court that day, and had been part of a case which was to be tried that day. I had not thought long upon the subject. It now seemed that I was to be made acquainted with the particulars—which I certainly heard very little of man's words and knowledge afterward gathered.

Silas Thornton was charged in the grand jury alone in a house in the Five Points. He was a mean and sordid miser, whose whole heart and soul and strength were absorbed in the love of money—a love that had driven out of him almost every human feeling, and made him starve his wife, drive his son out of doors, rob if he could safely, grind the faces of the poor, crawl to the rich, and become hated, despised, and feared by every being with whom he had to do. I said he was alone. But an old woman kept his house for him—a toothless, wrinkled, crouching hag, with small, cunning eyes seemed to have lost every spark of intelligence, and whose mumbling voice never formed a word that man could understand. But she locked all the doors when her master was out, ate nothing apparently, never bought clothes, but wore the old rags, was deaf and could hear no secrets, was near dumb and could tell none. She used to sit, cowering over the nearly cold stove, night and day, until one night have wondered whether the smells of rags she was was alive or dead. I spoke, too, of a son. He was a wild, open-hearted fellow enough, and as generous, doubtless, as his father was avaricious. Such a home was no place for him, and he had run away several years before to one leaving behind, with many tears and lover's vows, a young girl—she who now implored me.

Upon a certain night the wreck the son had suddenly and unexpectedly returned from sea. It was marked by the same voice in which he now had made his appearance in the evening, and that, after knocking at the door for some time, he was admitted, only upon the identification, by the old woman. Certainly the prospect was not very cheering for him, as, when he had before dictated that period, he had not chosen to return. The engagement to the young girl was always reason enough if there was to be one said, for thinking that he might be called upon to provide for his son's household. And now he was almost obliged to become intruder by every presence, uncertain whether he would not immediately be thrust forth. Nothing more was said of the young man's appearance, so that he was not then on speaking terms. With some few speculations as to the reception the old miser would give to his son, and criticisms upon his rough and uncouth bearing, the neighbors went about their business.

Next day there was a rumor that something was wrong in the old man's house. Long after the hour when the shutter of the room where the old man slept sat up was unopened, it remained closed. This in itself, one would think, need have excited no actual alarm. But there was something so uncommon in his habits that he was more closely watched than other people. There was an undefined feeling that something was wrong. One could tell how or why, but a sort of dread began to creep over people; and by the middle of the day quite a crowd had collected in front of the house, scrutinizing the windows, and talking in whispers of the miser and his treasure. The patrolman, between whom and me any steps to see if any thing was amiss, and so the day passed over. But next day the excitement became unbearable; and the Americans do not stand upon much ceremony in cases of emergency, a few bold spirits burst the door open, and entered the house. But the boldest of them walked gently, and peered anxiously before them, as they saw what a dreary, terrible place these they had entered. And their minds were almost prepared to find, as they did, the old man dead on the floor of his room.

He had been dead many hours. As he lay on his face, the blood from his battered head and wounded throat had spread pools about him. The place was in great disorder, but there were no evidences of any struggle. He had evidently been struck down as he slept, and then the murder was completed as he lay insensible. His keys were in his pocket, and his desk, a large one, was not touched, as were also many articles of value stowed away in strong boxes. Upon the floor was a heavy and formidable bludgeon-staff, its head covered with blood and hair. Where was the old woman? She was found in the kitchen, in her old attitude—she did not seem to have been questioned. And where was the son? He was not in the house; but the police knew that a score of persons had seen him in his hand when he knocked at his father's door not many hours before!

Police reporters are not so perfect in New York in those days as they are now, but it was not long before the son was captured. He was found lurking within a few squares on the Battery—then a beautiful place—and both were locked up. He struggled hard to escape, but she begged him not to drive the officers to use force, and he submitted, saying that they should pay for detaining him. But on his close examination he was told of the charge, and of the evidence furnished by the club and his exit to his father, as well as by the notice of many who knew and saw him and lived. Wine, too, left for the night in darkness, the full realization of his situation overcame his rash spirit, and he cowed. The girl had been set free—there was no need to shut her up in prison—but with the first breath of morning she was back, begging to be let in to him to take whose life was to kill her. Next day the young man was committed for trial, as was inevitable, and, in fact, the evening of the same day that his sweet-heart came to me, as I have already described it.

These being the facts, I saw that they present not much difficulty. Whether the young man was guilty or not, guilty of the above heavy charges, indeed the wretched piece of humanity who lived with the murdered man could tell any thing, for never any thing did. Perhaps the worst circumstance in the case was that a man who lived next door heard, as he stated, about an hour after the son had been let into the house. One voice was that of the old man, the other that of the prisoner, who seemed to speak as if highly exasperated. The sound had ceased suddenly, and soon afterward the back door was opened, as he knew by the sound, and a heavy heavy step passing down the passage leading thence into another street.

Master Thornton died, and the weeping girl had the evidence looked black, and that, though I would do my best for her lover, I feared the worst. For the present she must leave me; I would collect my thoughts.

I sat in my room an hour after hour, revolving this strange deed in my mind; but the longer I thought the more I feared that, though the murder was most likely unpremeditated, it might have been the result of passion called forth by the sense of old wrongs and present harshness. At last, however, I decided upon my plan of action, and proceeded to carry it out forthwith.

In the first place, I visited the prisoner. Although my youthful faith in the science of physiognomy had been much shaken by many cases in which innocent faces had given the lie to black hearts which had brought youth and age together side by side in the courts which I frequented, I was anxious to study the face and manner of this youth. I wished to believe him innocent. I should work all the better, perhaps; and if his face seemed ruffianly or treacherous, I should certainly work none the less heartily, for it was my first criminal case. He was sitting down as I entered, but rose immediately. A strong, strong forward prompter, often his hand frankly, like a man. I took it as promptly; the action seemed to show that no stain of blood was upon it. And as I reviewed the cheerful though serious manner in which he spoke of his prison, and the human voice in which he hoped God would be good to him for his poor Mary's sake, I found my eyes becoming dim, and felt a rising mist in my throat.

His story was this. As I knew before, he had just returned from seven years at sea. Money he had not made, and did not intend to offer to his father for any. His sole object, as he said, was to make peace, and if he could not gain a hearty consent to his long-postponed marriage, at least to know that it had become a matter of little interest to the old man. Absence, too, had obliterated the softened down much of the asperity with which he had left home; like many others, when he fell among strangers he had yearned for the hate, and therefore home of his young days. Trying to blame himself for the anger of his father for much that had passed between them, he turned his steps toward the old house, with something like love for his parent warming in his heart. He knocked at the door, timidly at first, and then long and loudly. At last a slow, shuffling step came along the echoing passage, the door was unbarked and after both being slowly unfastened, the well-remembered face of the old woman peered forth from the still chained door.

"I want to see my father," said he.

And the old woman, locking the door upon him, again shuffled back with his message. Thrice was it disregarded, and thrice the son begged to be let in. At last the door was ventured to the prison-room of his father. The old man did not raise his head from the desk which he was writing at, but, slowly closing the book, putting his spectacles carefully into their case, and thrusting both hands into his pockets, he nodded to the prisoner and in his chair, and in his harshest tones demanded what the young man wanted.

"Nothing," was the reply.

"Then why come here?" was the loving response.

"I thought you might like to see your son," was the answer to this greeting.

"Then I thought that I should never see your face again. Go!" said his father.

The young man tried long and earnestly to soften the old man toward him, but in vain; perhaps. Old Thornton only grew exasperated, and began to shout and swear at his son as if possessed.

"Father," said he, "you're like your mother, with her baby face and spaniel's whining! Travel, will you? or I'll beat this book about your head, old as I am!"

And so the son saw that his home was never to be reconciled to him, and that he never to be a parent to him, and he turned to go.

"Father," said he, as he stood for the last time upon the threshold. "You think I come for money —I know you love it—but I do not. Shall I come again and see you?"

"Look here!" said Silas, with a quiet grin, "I hate you—I hate your mother—I hate every body and every thing; but it's the only thing a man has. If you say you don't covet it, you lie! I'll keep it till I die; and then, if old Madge is alive, she shall have it; if she's dead, I'll leave it to twenty yards deep, if then old hands can do the job."

The young man left the room without another word. As he did so, he was surprised to see that old Madge had been listening; but she seemed so imbecile that he could not believe that she was so insensible to his voice that she would not open the front-door for him, and be departed by the back-door. He had done something more when he say. And that was all my client knew of the last days of Silas Thornton, as he appeared to me with tears in his eyes, and, I thought, truth in every tone and look.

I was a prisoner be of good cheer, though my heart misgave me as I thought of the difficulties with which he was surrounded; and I left him. Then I began to secure the chief witness that had already been done, and she was safe in the House of Detention. She was safe to see her, which I at once proceeded to do. To my surprise, she presented a very different appearance from that which she had worn on the preliminary trial of a day before. Then she was insensible to sound or look; now she seemed vivacious, and eager almost to loquacity. Another fruitful sign, for I knew general observations, she asked where Master Henry Quin was, and always I told him.

"Did my master make a will?" said she.

"Not that I know of," said I; "but you should know all about that."

And I put into my face a look of confidential friendship.

"Well, true, true, true," she absently returned. "But"—and she became again alive, and careful—"how are you here—" you seem to know something about it?

"Well," said I, "I don't tell all I know at first. You are a fine old lady, Madge."

Oh! what a change in her face then!

"That's so! Lucky, lucky, lucky Madge!" I say to myself, night and day, night and day. Good for me. Ah, ha! I knew it would come to this, and it has. I haven't studied it over so long for nothing. Good, good, good for old Madge! She's lucky; and, stranger, she's clever too. D'ye see that?

I did mind that, and I told her so, but with a smile of approval that made me blush as I put it on.

"Yes," whispered she, with a chuckle between the words, "I'm his heir. Look here, Mister Lawyer! You're young and fond of pleasure, ain't you? I was once. Well, I shall want a young lawyer, fond of pleasure, and poor—d'ye mark me? poor—in a few days. Ha, ha! When old Thornton's dead, and that cub of a son of his hung, come to me, lawyer—I shall want you. D'ye mind me? I shall be rich; you are poor, poor—young men always are—it's only old men and women that get rich. But be sure and wait!" —and the old hag thrust her wrinkled face close to him—"wait till old Thornton's buried, and his cub of a son hung."

This shriek startled me much, for it might be the raving of madness or the babbling of age. She ceased talking, however, after this outburst, nor could I get a particle of evidence concerning the son. The only thing I could get out of her was either vacant looks, or a hideous grin, and a gesture of secrecy, or a whisper to "wait."

Silas Thornton was buried, and the preparations for trial showed that his son should be kept close on swiftly. I had not a particle more evidence to offer. The old woman had again relapsed into silence, and would not speak to a soul. Nothing could be brought forward in the prisoner's favor, while against him stood the damning facts and the know both to Him who is the searcher of hearts. Ah! there is another, a greater, a more terrible, the stroke of misfortune, which would have proved a well-spring of life if unsealed earlier, and while the young and innocent spirit was kindly seeking for the promised land.

And so the trial came on.

It was a fair day, and the solemn aspect of the court seemed almost wicked, I thought, in the face of nature's loveliness. It should have been a day of clouds and storms upon which to try a man for his life. "Henry Thornton," at length said the clerk, and the prisoner was brought in. At the same moment a heavy staff, stained with hair and blood, was laid on the clerk's table, and I knew that the miser's face placed beside it. An object done up in rags almost, he seemed, was propped up in a corner of the dock-box, and people wondered what it could be. A slender form, also, dropped at my side dressed in black, and people knew that it was the prisoner's betrothed. He looked pale all, and a shade of doubt—not fear—passed over him. But a sigh was raised for a moment as from the face under it shone out such a beam of sunlight that the shadow vanished and he sat down. Then over me the look, and I heard them said under their breath, "How young they both look!"

The first, second, third, and fifth witnesses were called. They had to prove the knocking and admittance of the young man, and to identify the stick. They all did it clearly; and the prisoner said, with a low, that what they said was true.

Then came the next short door, who had heard the quarreling, as he thought, and the footsteps leaving the house by the back way. His testimony was confirmed, also, by the prisoner's own correct in every particular. There sore loud voices; they were those of his father and himself; he did go away by the back door.

Next came the evidence of the police, and those who first entered the house. All was clear. But their testimony was unquestionable—the stick did belong to the prisoner.

Next came the old woman. She was, or pretended to be, perfectly imbecile and as deaf as a post, and was soon told to stand down. As she turned to go from the box, "Oh, he is lost, he is lost!" sobbed the girl at my side, and "He is lost!" said in effect an awe-struck murmur around the court.

But neither the girl, nor the prisoner, nor the judge, nor the jury knew how the gluers knew the old woman threw at me. I arose calmly, as one who feels power within him.

"One word more, Madge," said I, very gently, and she came back. "The prisoner seemed agitated when he came in at the door, didn't he, Madge?"

"He was mad with his father for keeping him waiting," the old creature responded.

Every breath in court was held, and the judge took a dip of ink as he stared to see this sudden making of the dumb to speak.

"Did they quarrel any, Madge, when he came in?"

"All the time he was there," said she.

"Well—just so—it's important to prove that they quarreled, you see, Madge. How do you know that they quarreled all the time?" said I, in my blandest tones.

"Because I listened," said she, with a sort of sly laugh.

"Why did you listen, Madge?—did you fear mischief?"

"Yes, I not only feared but I knew what was coming," said she, very grim! "I remember I was away down stairs before it was done, don't you understand, somewhere before it was done."

"Now, Madge, one more question, and that is all. Don't be alarmed; it's only one question: When old Thornton was down on the floor—"

"Ay, he was down on the floor," said she.

"With his head smashed in with that stick—" added I.

"That stick—smashed in: yes, that was it," she replied, almost in a whisper.

"Are you listening, Madge?" added I, softly—very softly.

"Yes, yes; go on: I hear every word. He's young and poor—poor," she said, vacantly.

"Then," shouted I, with all my power; "then what did you do with the knife you cut his throat with?"

Could that thing have been human which fell in a heap upon the floor, and tore and pulled at itself, and shrieked and yelled? It was no fiend; it was old Madge, whose words thrilled through the court.

"I killed him! I killed him! I killed him! Look up the chimney. Ha, ha! It was too clever for him! What did he promise to marry me for, forty years ago? What did he starve me for? What did he carve me for, every day? He said he'd make a lady of me; so he has—I've got his money; and I knocked his head, and I cut his throat, and I'll turn him out of the house if I hadn't kissed it many a time, forty years ago."

Raving thus she was carried out of court, while the crowd went up about after shout of gladness; and the prisoner—a prisoner no longer—took a fainting form in his arms, and begged the people to give her air for God's sake!

Old Madge lived some years after this, a perfect maniac. Once only did she speak of the murderous illumine that aged face. There were some who pitied her, and said that she may have seen the man she married, and anyhow it was certain that he had not used her well. But most people forgot all about her and the murder, and the old red house was the only token left of the deed.

It was not long ago that I found myself travelling over the Western prairies, and I was the homestead of a friend, who had come all the way to New York to fetch me. It was a lovely day, something the red waves of light sinking below an ocean of grass, dented by the hoofs of buffaloes and prairie-dogs, and the tall sunflowers, that stood long of matters gone by and the present circumstances in which we found ourselves.

"She is happy in the day's gone," said he; "and we have four fine children. Every thing prospers with us."

"Do you ever speak of your father's death?" said I.

"Never," said he. "We used to now and then at first, but we thought it best to try and forget it, and his fate is never mentioned now. And I am glad the old house in the Five Points is pulled down."

LOVE.

Pass the hand once again over the glossy black hair, silken and soft as a raven's breast. What the spell of the silken ringlet twined about the hand it up on the snow-clad instep. Stoop, touch the hem of the floating muslin and give it the last careful whisking. The dress is one of terse from the outer gate by the graveled road comes the fateful whisper. The voices rise like the accompanied to the bride's chamber from the drawing-rooms and parlor, liquid with light, with bright eyes, and joyous faces and hearts. The voices are tremulous and shifting like the shadows of bending grain-fields—waiting, expectant. Is the necklace of pearls lying smoothly on the bride's neck? Is she one white flower, gleaming out from the golden-brown hair, pure and white as a spark of love in the night of life? Let the bride stand away a little while you take, in one full glance, the splendid figure, the rich dress, and perfect beauty, which glances the flesh-tint of arm and neck, the peach-bloom of cheek, the crimson of lip, and the diamond sparkle of the dancing eyes. There! it is all finished. The bridal vail clings with its silver fringes to a fair form that is ever approached the altar, sweeping thence, graceful and airy as a film of light, or a sweep of thought.

Four years ago—and she is yet young—Ella plighted her troth to Albert C——. He had leaned over the wall, against which the carnation and sapberry bushes were pushing their crimson or purple clusters, and looked in her eyes. There! it is all finished. "I COULD REND THE FLOWER THAT THOU DOST PLUCK."

NON SATIS.

'Tis not enough to see thee, like a star
That rises on our sight when eve is clear,
Which all may view—but all must view afar.
'Tis not enough to watch thee, as the moon
Gazes on earth with steadfast face, but we're
May voice with voice exchange and intertune.

'Tis not enough to meet thee as by chance
In lighted rooms, and feign a cold repose—
Whereas I tremble to thy slightest glance.
'Tis not enough to cross thee in the glare
Of day, when serried friends thy path endure—
Content the sunlight of thy smile to share.

No! I am jealous of all senseless things
That hear and touch thee—of the fluttering wind
That dallies round with food, familiar wings,
And dares to kiss thine eyes and lift the tress
From thy blue temple; of the jewel blind
Upon thy bosom pillow'd, passionless.

And I could rend the flower that thou dost pluck,
And sink its odor with thy sunshine,
And taste its honey which the bee did suck.
Oh! I could kill thy sleek caressing hound
That frets thy hand, and blameless may entwine
Thy feet, whene'er he choose to bound.

For I would have thee, as the miser hoards
His idol gold, lock'd close with ponderous key,
In chest of brazen bands round clean boards.
I could not rest until with nails unfurl'd
I bore my treasure o'er the secret sea,
To some safe isle of desert world.

Because I want thee ALL; and nothing less
Than thy whole being would my heart suffice—
Thee and thy love entire I must possess.
No jot withdrawn atom of thy love
Passing the sphere of adamantine ice,
Within whose vault we must in oneness move.

LIFE SCENES IN THE SOUTH.

A TRUE SHARK STORY.

SOME ten years ago I was traveling in the upper part of Georgia for the benefit of my health, ever precarious, but then infinitely more so than now. Broken down by disease and exhausted by fatigue and suffering, I was glad to reach a pleasant little village where I could rest for a few days and recruit my wasted energies. And right glad was I that it was not to sojourn for a brief season in so pleasant a locality; and little did I then dream that there, in the heart of the uplands and three hundred miles from the sea-coast, I would find material for a most thrilling shark story; or that I should, in after years, be the instrument of making public to the world the most unparalleled adventure ever recorded, and which no other man, Jonah excepted, ever had with any of the piscatorial tribe.

No sooner had I taken up my lodgings in the delightful little village of T——, than, to my gratification, I learned that an old friend of our family was the resident Episcopal minister; and that it was entirely through his instrumentality—his own liberal donations and personal efforts—that the beautiful little Gothic church, which I could see from my window, raised its tiny, but graceful spires to heaven, like the little uplifted hands of so many children, begging the Father of Mercies for blessings upon the town. Surely, I thought, God will not send his "fire and brimstone" upon a place thus honored by His temple; for if there had been found but ten men in Sodom to rear an altar or build a tabernacle God's vengeance would not have been hurled against "the cities of the plain;" he would have spared them for the sake of the few who worshiped in His temple and offered incense upon His sacred altar.

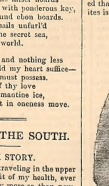
I was thus musing and resolving in my own mind that I would not fail to call upon the reverend gentleman, when I received an invitation to come to see him sans ceremonie, as he was sick and could not leave the house without the consent of his physician. From various circumstances I had never seen Mr. J—— but was prepared to love him as an old friend. I found him lying upon a lounge in his study with a book in his hand, and his wife, a most estimable lady after the good old Virginia style, seated by his side and smiling happiness around her. He was then convalescing under considerable fever, and had a distressing cough; insomuch that his physician expressed his fears to me that he would fall a victim to consumption. But he has recovered his health now, and is as active and a useful man.

Although sick with a fever, I found him full of humor; for he was no monk, and despised the asceticism of the religious recluse. I was not only greatly entertained for two or three days but so much amused that I forgot for a while my own sufferings in laughing over his humorous narratives, his happy and original conjectures, his witty repartees. But there were times when the subjects of our conversation were of a graver character; when we spoke of the religious and political history of the past, the investigations and accomplishments of science, the wonderful progress in the arts, and the advancement of the present age in all the branches of human knowledge. It was then that, casting my eyes around the little cabinet, I discovered some rare geological specimens together with some fossil remains; and among the latter collection I saw the upper and lower maxilliaries of a huge shark, which had evidently very recently quitted its watery element. As I looked upon the keen serrated teeth set like the teeth of a saw, five or six rows in number, and each row finer and set in an opposite direction, I could not help exclaiming, "How easy for these sharp teeth to cut a man's body in twain! Perhaps, too, many a poor fellow has found his grave here!"

"Very likely!" said Mr. J——; "for his mate or first cousin came near cutting asunder the body of a very dear friend of mine!" He spoke seriously, and knowing him to be a man who could not jest about so solemn a subject as death, and that he was furthermore known to all men as a gentleman of strict veracity and unblemished integrity, I replied with a feeling of interest, "Indeed, Sir! you amaze me! how did that happen?"

Pray draw a chair near me and I will relate to you a most remarkable adventure; one, too, which clearly proves that God's Providence is as plainly visible around us, and is daily manifested in the world as in the days of old when it led the children of Israel away from their enemies and out of all their difficulties, through 'a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night'." Oh, Sir, there is a vast deal of downright infidelity upon this subject, and it is very strange that men's eyes are so blinded that they can not see that the God of the Israelites is the God of the Christian; that the everlasting God is not dead, nor does his Providence ever slumber; but that his sweetest heart ever prompts him to fly to the help of his children whenever He sees them in trouble or distress! But I am not going to preach you a sermon on Providence, but to tell you a true shark story; not a fiction, but a fact! And lest you may suppose, Sir, that our seaislanders are rather fishy, I will refer you to Mr. ——, upon whose integrity you may rely; for his word, like the law of the Medes and Persians, is never altered and unalterable in regard to truth.

"It has been but a year or two ago," continued the reverend gentleman, "that two of my friends went out one afternoon for the purpose of striking, or 'graining,' Sting-rays—a species of round flattish, like a plaice, but possessing a long tail, which is armed with a sharp, deadly sting, like the point of a bayonet, from three to four inches in length. Although their flesh is never eaten, yet are they frequently hunted in shallow water, for it requires a man of strength to hold them down; and of activity also, to avoid their sting, which has been known to produce lock-jaw and death in a few hours; and many a man has been tripped from his heels by the flounce of this singular animal, whose creation seems to have been designed simply to show the handiwork of God, and as food for sharks and other sea-monsters. The weapon which is used in their pursuit is a double or triple pronged instrument, armed with a barb like a fish-hook, to prevent its drawing out from the flesh of the stingray; and this trident, something after the fashion of old Neptune's, is attached to a handle five or six feet in length, so that it answers both on a bayonet and staff—to charge the enemy and assist the weary pilgrim on his way.



"Our two fishermen had been pursuing their sport for some time with perhaps doubtful success, when they came to a long and a wide frith (or arm of the sea), making out into the beach, which is usually very low, and in many places entirely dry at ebb-tide, but which at the flood and high tides is from three or four to eight or ten feet in depth. These friths, or bays, are called 'fellys' by our seaislanders. Why this name has been given them I know not, unless from the fact, as the Spaniards would call them, they are 'un especie de val'—a species of vat; and as it is consequent downright foolishness for any thing, whether man or beast, to enter into and be caught in a net, so also is it folly for mullet and other 'small fry' to go up into these friths, where they are sure to be caught by shark or the net of the fishermen. My two friends had proceeded up this folly, and then had crossed over to the other side at the ebb-tide, where the water was not more than from ankle to knee deep. Their game led them in different directions, so that they became widely separated; and when the flood was up they found themselves on opposite sides of the folly. The gentleman who had crossed over perceived a huge sea-shark passing slowly up the folly, intent on catching mullet. Perceiving that his friend was about to cross over, he hailed him to warn him of the presence of the monster; requesting him at the same time to return to the beach until the coobi tring the boat round and take him in. But although sound is usually heard to a great distance on the water, the surf was now rolling high upon the beach, and the wind had risen with the tide, so that his voice could not be heard. It was in vain that he shouted 'A shark! a shark! Wait till I can bring you the boat!' It was in vain that he waved his hand in the most excited manner, directing him to go back, for 'a shark was above him, and would soon return upon his tracks.' The doomed man misunderstood all his words and signs. He supposed that his friend was hurrying him to come over quickly lest the water should become too deep. And he made the more haste, until he found himself in the middle of the folly, and up to his waist in water, before he perceived the enemy. Now, however, it was too late to retreat, and he could not reach the opposite shore in time to avoid the danger; for the shark had perceived him, and was coming down upon his victim. Slowly and leisurely, as the epicure who gloats in anticipation over his meal, did the sea-monster come nearer, and yet nearer! Death seemed inevitable. There was no chance for escape. He must stand quietly and meet his fate! His hour was come! Adieu now to the friends of earth! Adieu to the wife of his bosom, and the children who had clustered like gems set around a father's heart! The man is doomed—doomed to be cut in two, just at the waist, by those six rows of sharp white teeth! 'O God! how horrible!' exclaimed his companion, as he saw the sea-monster turn upon his side and open his wide jaws to cut in twain the body of his beloved friend. 'Great God! he is lost!' and well may we imagine that his hair stood on end, and the cold sweat gushed in thick, clammy streams from every pore!

"But there stood his friend, in mortal peril, as no other man perhaps would have stood, unless God had held him up by His strong right hand; and if his heart hushed its drummings at the approach of Death, and stood still in the presence of the conqueror, his eye winked not, for it was fixed upon the keen, savage eyes of the monster. His left foot was advanced forward, and his right braced back. He held his weapon (the grains or gig) firmly in his hand, as a drowning man who grasps convulsively a straw; but it was drawn back with determination, as the soldier who prepares to thrust his bayonet into the approaching enemy. But his heart is a bold spirit to entertain the least hope, thus feebly armed, against such a foe. For of what avails is such a weapon against so huge a monster as a sea-shark eighteen feet in length?

"Why, Sir, he will snap your shaft in two as a reed! He will swallow you, weapon and all! There! Oh, my God, he has done it! Just as I thought! Farewell, my poor friend!"

"There was a huge flounce—an awful splashing for a few moments—and the white spray was flung high in the air! The gentleman on shore closed his eyes, and, staggering back a few paces, uttered a deep groan. When he looked for the first time he saw no one. His friend was gone. Surely, thought he, he is dead. But there is no redness of the waters. Could he have been swallowed alive at one gulp? Horrible thought! No, no—above is he! He rises from the briny waters alive and well, but stunned and almost stupefied by the intensely-exciting contest in which he had been engaged. He is astonished, and wonders that he is alive. He looks around, expecting to see the shark still coming toward him and rolling upon his side. 'Where is he?' he cries, in amazement. His friend, with tears of joy streaming from his eyes, points with his hand toward the sea. They looked and saw in wonder. There went the monster, flying as an arrow from a well-strung bow, or as the wind sea, there to die, as a wounded kite, alone! And, as far as the eye could see, they beheld the staff of the 'grains' or 'gig' sticking from his throat, and quivering in the air, from the rapidity of his motion, as the bare mast of a vessel whose sails have been rent into tatters and blown away by the storm! Oh, it was a wonderful Providence! and who can imagine the heartfelt gratitude which must have swelled almost to bursting the heart of the man thus rescued by the strong hand of Jehovah! For, although he saw it not, it was God's broad hand which held the shaft, and God's bravery arm which threw the frail weapon into the monster's throat. But it was as effectual as David's little sling against Goliah, the vain braggadocio, who defied God's army!

"And oh! Sir, if my friend went not forth dry-shod, but dripping wet—if the waters did not rise up on either side as a frozen wall—yet, Sir, when

"MY GOD, HE HAS DONE IT!—FAREWELL, MY POOR FRIEND!"

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER,

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXVI.

HAD Fortune decreed that I should be rich, I believe I would have been the most popular of men. There is such a natural kindness of disposition in me, blended with the most refined sense of discrimination. I love humanity in the aggregate, and, at the same time, with a rare delicacy of sentiment, I can follow through all the tortuous windings of the heart, and actuate by sympathies the emotions that I never experienced. No rank is too exalted, no lot too humble, for the exercise of my benevolence. I have sat in my arm-chair with a beating cheek, a big heart, as I imagined the troubles of a king, and I have drunk my Bordeaux with tears of gratitude as I fancied myself a peasant with only water to slake his thirst. To a man of highly organized temperament, the privations themselves are not necessary to eliminate the feelings they would suggest. Coarser natures would require starvation to produce the sense of hunger, nakedness to cause that of cold, and so on; the gifted can be in rags while inclosed in a wadded dressing-gown; they can go to the perfects to bet after a meal of oysters and roasted cheese; they can, if they will, be morally ossified as they sit over their wine, or cast away after shipwreck with their feet on the fender. Great privileges all these; happy is he who has them, happy are they amidst whom he tries to spread the blessings of his inheritance!

Amidst the many admirable traits which I recognize in myself—and of which I speak not boastfully, but modestly, being conscious that my nature as far removed from my own agency as the color of my eyes or the shape of my nose—of these, I say, I know of none more striking than such as fit me to be a patron. I am graceful as a lover, touching as a friend, but I am really great as a protector.

Reveling in such sentiments as these, I stood at my window looking at the effect of moonlight on the Falls. It seemed to me as though in the grand spectacle before my eyes I beheld a sort of illustration of my own nature, where, with meteoric emotions could come gushing, foaming, and falling, and yet the source be never exhausted, the bed ever at full. I gazed as poetically to observe that the Champagne was excellent, and that I had drunk but a fair share of the second bottle to the health of the Widow Cliquot herself. Thus standing and musing, I was startled by a noise behind me, and, turning round, I saw one of the smallest of men, in a little red Greek jacket and short yellow breeches, carefully employed in spreading a small piece of carpet on the floor, a strip like a very diminutive hearth-rug. This done, he gave a sort of little exclamation of "Ho!" and cut a somersault in the air, alighting on the flat of his back, which he announced by a like cry of "Ho!" He was up again, however, in an instant, and repeated the performance three times. He was about, as I judged by the arrangement of carpet, next to proceed to other exercises equally diverting, when I stopped him by asking who he was.

"Your excellency," said he, drawing himself up to his full height of, say, four feet, "I am Varcheus!"

Every one knows what provoking things are certain chance resemblances, how disturbing to the tight current of thought, how perverting to the free exercise of reason. Now this creature before me, in his deeply indented features, high, narrow forehead, aquiline nose, and resolute chin, was marvelously like a certain great field-marshal with whose features, engravings, and the portraits of him, we are all familiar. It was not of the least use to me that I knew he was not the illustrious general, but simply a strolling beak. There were the stern traits, haughty and defiant, and with them I would that the spirit of the great man would clash with the capers of the little one. Owing to this impression, it was impossible for me to address him without a certain sense of deference and respect.

"Will you not be seated?" said I, offering him a chair, and taking one myself. He accepted with all the quiet ease of good-breeding, and smiled courteously as I filled a glass and passed it toward him.

I pressed my hand across my eyes for a moment, while I reflected, and I muttered to myself,

"Oh, Potts, if instead of a tumbler this had really been the hero, what an evening might this be! Lives there that man in Europe so capable of feeling in all its intensity the glorious privilege of such a meeting? Who, like you, would listen to the wisdom distilling from those lips? Who would treasure up every trait of voice, accent, and manner, remembering not where one sounded, but every expressive? Who, like you, could have gracefully led the conversation so as to range over the whole wide ocean of that great life, taking in battles, and sieges, and stratagems, and congresses, and scenes of all that is most varied and exciting in existence? Would not the record of one such night, drawn by you, have been worth all the cold compilations and blank biographies that ever were written? You would have presented him as he sat there in front of you." I opened my eyes to paint from the model, and there was the little dog, with his legs straight up on each side of his head and forming a sort of Gothic arch over his face. The wretch had done the feat to amuse me, and I almost fainted with horror as I saw it.

"Sit down, Sir," said I, in a voice of stern command. "You little know the misery you have caused me."

I refilled his glass and closed my eyes once more. In my old pharmaceutical experiences I had often made bread pills, and remembered well how, almost immediately, they had been deemed successful. What relief from pain to the agonized sufferer had they not given! What sleep to the sleepless! What appetite, what vigor, what excitement! Why should not the same treatment apply to mental as to medicine? Why, with faith to aid me, can not he minister every wished-for mood of mind and thought? Why, I gave to myself the super-royal sufferer for the artist, the Venus herself is in his brain. Now, if that little fellow there would neither open nor close nor speak a word more of him. Let him sit firmly as he does now, staring me boldly in the face that way.

"Now," thought I, "lay your hand on the arm of your chair so, and let the other be clenched so. Very good. Don't move, don't utter a word, but nod to me at rare intervals."

He has since acknowledged that he believed me to be deranged; and, as he entered a harmless case, and he could rely on his activity for escape, he made no objection to my directions. The fact is, too, that he enjoyed the wine immensely, and was at liberty to drink as he pleased.

"Now," thought I, "one glance, only one, to see that he poses properly."

All right, nothing could be better. His face was turned slightly to one side, so much that the painters call action to the head, and he was perfect. I now resigned myself to the working of my own ease, to make all my investigations into the German mind. Mr. Varcheus. My intensest anxiety was then to ascertain if, like myself, his grace started in life with very grand aspirations.

"Did you feel, for instance, when playing practical jokes on the maids of honor in Dublin, and other odd years ago, that there was only in sportive vein throwing off so much light ballast as to make room for the heavier material that was to steady you in the storm-tossed sea before you? Have you experienced the almost necessity of these little eccentricities of gravity as I have? Was there always in your heart, as a young man, as there is now in mine, a profound conviction of the opinions of a contemptuous world, that you continually find yourself expressing to your friends? Do you feel, I shall be sure?" There was another investigation which touched me still more closely, but it was long before I could approach it, so great was the difficulty and the delicacy of the inquiry, but with that same recklessness of consequences which would make me catch a wasp in my bare hand lest if I was drowning, I clutched at this dreadful question, and, with a desperation of nervousness, asked: "Was your grace ever afraid?" I know the impertinence of the question, but I was only aroused from my reverie by the word's forcing it. Nature has made me many things, but not courageous. Nothing on earth could induce me to risk life; the mere fact of existence is the greater grows my repugnance. Now, I would have liked to catch a reminiscence of that commonplace. Am I likely to grow out of it? Shall I ever be a dare-devil, intrepid, fire-eating son of mercury? How long will this misery cover me? Shall I feel it coming? Will it come from within, or through external agencies? And when it has arrived, will it be a relief? As I desired to drive the Zouaves into the sea by the vacuum created by the North Cork Rifles, so shall I only be great in council, and take weekly trips in the Fairy to Cowes? I'd like to know this, and begin a system of preparation for my position, as I once knew of a militia captain who hardened himself for a campaign by sleeping with a pistol in his hand for the window-stool.

As I opened my eyes I saw the stern features in front of me. I trembled. I said, "I was never afraid, Sir!" rang through my brain till they filled every ventricle with their din.

"Never afraid?"

"No, Sir."

"Not at Toores Vedras?"

"I tell you no, Sir!"

Whether I uttered this last with any uncommon degree of vehemence or not, I so frightened the waiter that he cast a somersault over one of the chair, and stood grinning at me through the rails at the back of it. I motioned to him to be resented, while, passing my hand across my brow, I waved away the bright illusions that beset me, and, with a heavy sigh, re-entered the dull world of reality.

"You are a clown," said I, meditatively, "what is a clown?"

He did not answer me in words, but, placing his hands on his knees, stared at me steadfastly, and then, having fixed my attention, his face performed a series of the most fearful contortions I ever beheld. With one horrible spasm he made his mouth appear to stretch from ear to ear; with another, his nose wagged from side to side; with a third, his eyebrows went up and down alternately, giving the different sides of his face two directly antagonistic expressions. I was shocked and horrified, and called to him to desist.

"And yet," thought I, "there are natures who can think, can feel, and see in them matter for mirth and laughter!

"Old man," said I, gravely, "has it ever occurred to you that in this horrible commixture of expression, wherein grief wars with joy and anxiety with mirth, you are like one who, with a noble instrument before him, should, instead of sweet sounds of harmony, produce wild, unearthly sounds, the jangling bursts of freshlike voices?"

"The Tintenfleck can play indifferently well, your excellency," said he, humbly. "I never had any skill that way myself."

Oh, what a strange nature was here! What a triple vail of dullness surrounds such dark intelligences!

"And where is the Tintenfleck? Why is she not here?" asked I, anxious to remove the discussion to a ground of more equality.

"She is without, your excellency. She did not dare to present herself till your excellency had desired, and is waiting in the corridor."

"Let her come in," said I, gravely; and I drew my chair to a distant corner of the room, so as to give the visitor wider area to appear in, while I could at the same time assume that multitude of splendid ease and graceful protection I have seen so often accomplish on the stage at the moment the ballet is about to begin. The door opened, and Vatercheu entered, leading Tintenfleck by the hand.

CHAPTER XXVII.

I WAS quite right—Tintenfleck's entrée was quite dramatic. She tripped into the room with a short step, nor arrested her run till she came close to me, when, with a deep courtesy, she bent down very low, and then, with a single spring backward, presented almost to the door again. She was very pretty—the comic though is a Moor, but with a rich brilliancy of skin never seen except in the race, for she was a Calabrian; and as she stood there, with her arms crossed before her, and one leg firmly advanced, I felt that Nature was very pretty fond—well pleased, she was like—all the Italian peasants one has seen in Rome, Naples, and Leghorn. My interest anxiety was then to ascertain if, like myself, his grace started in life with very grand aspirations.

"Did you feel, for instance, when playing practical jokes on the maids of honor in Dublin, and other odd years ago, that there was only in sportive vein throwing off so much light ballast as to make room for the heavier material that was to steady you in the storm-tossed sea before you? Have you experienced the almost necessity of these little eccentricities of gravity as I have? Was there always in your heart, as a young man, as there is now in mine, a profound conviction of the opinions of a contemptuous world, that you continually find yourself expressing to your friends? Do you feel, I shall be sure?" There was another investigation which touched me still more closely, but it was long before I could approach it, so great was the difficulty and the delicacy of the inquiry, but with that same recklessness of consequences which would make me catch a wasp in my bare hand lest if I was drowning, I clutched at this dreadful question, and, with a desperation of nervousness, asked: "Was your grace ever afraid?" I know the impertinence of the question, but I was only aroused from my reverie by the word's forcing it. Nature has made me many things, but not courageous. Nothing on earth could induce me to risk life; the mere fact of existence is the greater grows my repugnance. Now, I would have liked to catch a reminiscence of that commonplace. Am I likely to grow out of it? Shall I ever be a dare-devil, intrepid, fire-eating son of mercury? How long will this misery cover me? Shall I feel it coming? Will it come from within, or through external agencies? And when it has arrived, will it be a relief? As I desired to drive the Zouaves into the sea by the vacuum created by the North Cork Rifles, so shall I only be great in council, and take weekly trips in the Fairy to Cowes? I'd like to know this, and begin a system of preparation for my position, as I once knew of a militia captain who hardened himself for a campaign by sleeping with a pistol in his hand for the window-stool.

As I opened my eyes I saw the stern features in front of me. I trembled. I said, "I was never afraid, Sir!" rang through my brain till they filled every ventricle with their din.

"Never afraid?"

"No, Sir."

"Not at Toores Vedras?"

"I tell you no, Sir!"

Whether I uttered this last with any uncommon degree of vehemence or not, I so frightened the waiter that he cast a somersault over one of the chair, and stood grinning at me through the rails at the back of it. I motioned to him to be resented, while, passing my hand across my brow, I waved away the bright illusions that beset me, and, with a heavy sigh, re-entered the dull world of reality.

"You are a clown," said I, meditatively, "what is a clown?"

He did not answer me in words, but, placing his hands on his knees, stared at me steadfastly, and then, having fixed my attention, his face performed a series of the most fearful contortions I ever beheld. With one horrible spasm he made his mouth appear to stretch from ear to ear; with another, his nose wagged from side to side; with a third, his eyebrows went up and down alternately, giving the different sides of his face two directly antagonistic expressions. I was shocked and horrified, and called to him to desist.

"And yet," thought I, "there are natures who can think, can feel, and see in them matter for mirth and laughter!

"Old man," said I, gravely, "has it ever occurred to you that in this horrible commixture of expression, wherein grief wars with joy and anxiety with mirth, you are like one who, with a noble instrument before him, should, instead of sweet sounds of harmony, produce wild, unearthly sounds, the jangling bursts of freshlike voices?"

"The Tintenfleck can play indifferently well, your excellency," said he, humbly. "I never had any skill that way myself."

Oh, what a strange nature was here! What a triple vail of dullness surrounds such dark intelligences!

"And where is the Tintenfleck? Why is she not here?" asked I, anxious to remove the discussion to a ground of more equality.

"She is without, your excellency. She did not dare to present herself till your excellency had desired, and is waiting in the corridor."

"Let her come in," said I, gravely; and I drew my chair to a distant corner of the room, so as to give the visitor wider area to appear in, while I could at the same time assume that multitude of splendid ease and graceful protection I have seen so often accomplish on the stage at the moment the ballet is about to begin. The door opened, and Vatercheu entered, leading Tintenfleck by the hand.

CHAPTER XXVII.

I WAS quite right—Tintenfleck's entrée was quite dramatic. She tripped into the room with a short step, nor arrested her run till she came close to me, when, with a deep courtesy, she bent down very low, and then, with a single spring backward, presented almost to the door again. She was very pretty—the comic though is a Moor, but with a rich brilliancy of skin never seen except in the race, for she was a Calabrian; and as she stood there, with her arms crossed before her, and one leg firmly advanced, I felt that Nature was very pretty fond—well pleased, she was like—all the Italian peasants one has seen in Rome, Naples, and Leghorn. My intens some time, but when he had surmounted the difficulty, as though to show me how thoroughly he understood the request, and how nicely he appreciated its object, he began a series of facecontortions of the most dreadful kind, being a sort of programme of what he intended to exhibit to the distinguished company. I regretted this firmly, severely. I explained that on critical occasions like this, in all the relations of private life should be ever the gentleman; that the habits of the stage were no more suitable to carry into the street than the costume. I dilated upon the fact that John Kemble had been deemed fitting company by the First Gentleman of Europe; and that if his manner could have exposed him to a criticism, it was that, perhaps, a slight tendency to over-reserve, in cold and almost stern dignity. I'm not sure Vatercheln followed me completely, nor understood me at all times; I remember that he mumbled Kean and Lord Byron, but I now addressed myself pictorially to Tintenfleck—pictorially, I say, for words were hopeless. I signified that a res grande dame was about to receive her. I arose with my shirts expanded in both hands, made a reverent courtesy, throwing my head well back, and looking every inch a duchess. But alas for my powers of representation! I had burst into a hearty laugh, and had at last to lay her head on Vatercheln's shoulder out of pure exhaustion.

"Explain to her what I have told you, Sir, and do not at graming at me there like a baboon," said I, in a severe voice.

I can not say how he acquitted himself, but I could gather that a very lively altercation ensued, and it seemed to me as though she resolutely refused to subject herself to any further ordeals of what academicians call a private view. At last she was ready for the ring and the saw-dust, and the drollories of the men with chalk on their faces, but she would not accept high life on any terms. By degrees, and by arguments of his own ingenious devising, I found her, he said, weeping, at last she arose with a bound and cried out, "Eccoml!"

"Remember," said I to Vatercheln, as we left the room, "I am doing that which few would have the courage to dare. He will depend upon the dignity of her conduct, the grace of her manners, the well-bred ease of your address, to make me the victim of my intrepidity, and my painful possibility! retire covered with ineffable shame and discomfiture. Do you comprehend me?"

"Perfectly," said he, standing erect, and giving even in his attitude a sort of bulbond for future dignity. "Lend on!"

This was more familiar than he had been yet; but I scorned to notice it, as tension of nerves rose to a high purpose, and rendering him thus inaccessible to other thoughts than of the enterprise before him.

As I neared the door of Mrs. Keates's apartment, I hesitated as to how I should enter. Ought I to precede my friends, and announce them as they followed? Or would it seem more easy and more natural if I were to give my arm to Tintenfleck, leaving Vatercheln to bring up the rear? After much deliberation, this appeared to be the better course, especially as it left for granted that, although some peculiarities of costume might ask for explanation later on, I was about to present a very eligible and charming addition to the company.

I am scarcely able to say whether I was or was not annoyed by the mode in which she accepted the offer of my arm. At first the proposition appeared unintelligible, and she looked at me with one of those wide-eyed stares, as though to say, "What new gymnastic is this? What can be the use of which I never heard before?" and then, with a sort of jerk, she threw my arm up in the air and made a pirouette under it of such brief duration, that—

Half reproving I shook my head and offered her my hand, which she understood at once. She recognized such a mode of approach as legitimate and proper, and with an artistic shake of her fingers on the other hand and a confident smile she signified she was ready to go "on."

I was once on a time thrown over a horse's head into a slate quarry; a very considerable drop it was, and nearly fatal. On ascending vision I was carried in a small boat over the fall of a salmon weir, and buried along in the flood for almost three hundred yards. Each of these was a situation of excitement and peril, and with considerable confusion as the consequence; and yet I could deliberately recount you every striking phase of my terror, from my first fright down to my complete unconsciousness, and such mental traits as would gurantee truthfulness; while of the scene upon which I now adventured I preserve nothing but the vaguest and most unconnected memory.

I remember my advance into the middle of the room. I have a recollection of a large silver tureen, and beyond it a lady in a turban; another with long ringlets threw wax. I like such a noise like a small steamer, and there was a confusion of voices—about what, I can not tell—that increased the uproar, and we were all standing up and all talking together; and there was what seemed an angry discussion, and then the large turban and the ringlets swept majestically past me. The turban said, "This is too much, Sir!" and ringlets added, "Far too much, Sir!" and as they reached the door there was Vatercheln on his head, with a bunch of candles between his feet to light them out, and Tintenfleck, screaming with laughter, threw himself into an arm-chair and clapped a most riotous applause.

I stood a moment almost transfixed, then dashed out of the room, hurried up stairs to my chamber, bolted the door, drew a great clothespress against it for further security, and then threw myself upon my bed in one of those paroxysms of mad confusion in which a man can not say whether he is on the verge of inevitable ruin or has just been rescued from a dreadful fate. I would not, if even I could, recount all that I suffered that night. There was not a scene of open shame and disgrace that I did not picture to myself as incurring. I was every where in the stocks or the pillory. I wore a wooden pigeard on my breast, inscribed, "Potts, the Impostor." I was running at top speed before howling and yelling crowds. I was standing with a circle of protecting policemen amidst a mob eager to tear me to pieces. I was sitting on a hard stool while my hair was being cropped à la Pentonville, and a gray suit lay ready for me when it was done. But enough of such a dreary record. I believe I cried myself to sleep at last, and so soundly, too, that it was very late in the afternoon ere I awoke. It was the sight of the barricade I had erected at my door gave me the clew to the past, and again I buried my face in my hands and wept bitterly.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Burnett's Kalliston,

For removing Tan, Sunburn, Freckles, Redness and Eruptions of the Skin, and for rendering the complexion clear and beautiful.

The following testimonial furnishes conclusive evidence of the efficacy of this famous cosmetic:—

MALBORO', July 11, 1856.

Messrs. Joseph Burnett & Co.:

GENTS—The package of Kalliston came to hand last evening, and I have not had an opportunity to state to you how much we value it. My family have used it almost daily for more than two years, and now they think they can not do without it.

A single application has repeatedly removed the freckles from the face of my little boy, leaving his skin smooth and fair. And in all cases of sunburn or irritation of the skin, from whatever cause, it has thus far proved itself a perfect and very pleasant remedy.

I am, if you desire it, refer you to several cases of obstinate cutaneous disease, in which I know the Kalliston has had a wonderfully good effect; one in particular, the daughter of Mr. P——, one of my neighbors, had suffered for many years from eruptions and painful inflammation of the skin, (probably the effect of bad vaccine virus,) leaving it in several places pockmarked and quite sore. A few washes appeared to allay the irritation, and I have no doubt confirmed me that the effect of its use has been very marked and beneficial, that the skin has become soft and smooth, and the inflammation and redness has nearly disappeared. This is an important case, and I will tell you more about it when I see you.

I owe it to you to state that I did not believe in the efficacy of any cosmetic until I tried your Kalliston, and I cheerfully give my testimony in its favor.

Yours respectfully,

JOHN M. BOYD.

NOW READY

An Important Work, which, having been for several years in progress, is completed at an opportune time. It is the Life of Andrew Jackson.

By James Parton,
Author of "Life of Aaron Burr," etc.

Three Volumes, 636 to 734 pages each, with Steel Portraits.

PRICES.

CROWN OCTAVO EDITION.—Cloth Binding, $5; Sheep, $6 75; Half Calf, $10; Full Calf, $12.

SUBSCRIBERS' EDITION, Royal Octavo (Sold by Subscription only), Cloth, $7 00; Sheep, $8; Half Calf, $15; Full Calf, $18 00.

In his own lifetime, Andrew Jackson was the most popular of American citizens. Since his death, there is but one man more admired than he is by the masses of the people. His fame, to use the language of Henry Clay, is the property of the whole people, as part of the moral property of the nation.

The life of General Jackson was crowded with events. The whole of his career was peculiar, extraordinary, interesting, beyond that of any American of his time. His actions and his failings, his good actions and his bad actions, all alike bear the stamp of his strong individuality. At the same time, he was the great Democrat, and he did not annihilate. No man could resist his invincible will, or stand the shock of his overwhelming energy.

To this hour his influence is felt and seen in the character of the government. No one has entertained the politics of to-day who does not know much of the nature and value of the Democratic party, with which, perhaps, more than any other, destroyed, as the head of the party which has ruled the country, with short intervals, since the day on which he assumed the presidential chair, thirty years ago.

Especially at this time, when the country is in a precarious and uncertain state as regards the future, a history of Jackson's administration is of peculiar interest.

Mr. Parton has been several years engaged in the preparation of this work, and has bestowed upon it the most careful research and investigation. The first volume of the Subscribers' Edition was issued a year since; the second was published last spring; and the third and last is now completed. The first and second volumes passed through FIVE editions in the warmest commendation.

Mr. Parton is a journalistic writer for the Southern Field and Fireside, "A capacity for exhaustive research and historical synthesis, considerable literary accuracy, and most genial, captivating humor. He infuses into dull facts a vitality which lays the fire of his own vivacity, and to events of importance and anecdotes entertaining in themselves, he adds a new force and significance. The genius of the raconteur united to a discriminating judgment—the power to see to generalize, and to give to sensible judiciously; unflattering industry, scholarly taste, and, by common consent, a high degree of trustworthiability—these are the high and unusual endowments brought by Mr. Parton to the preparation of his great work."

The Life of Jackson "possesses a degree of interest which will make it immediately popular all over the World. An opinion which the New York Journal of Commerce says of the most conservative and carefully judicious; for it pronounces it "A Life indeed, and before which the voluminous and sometimes pigmy biographies of modern times sink into stupidity and insignificance. If we would write all we think concerning the merits of this first volume, we fear we should run the risk of being accused of indiscriminate praise. As to the second volume, the same journal says, that it even surpasses the first in interest, as it relates to the most unique vigor of its style."

"One of the most readable of books. Every page is alive. It is as romantic as a medieval romance, and yet has the elements of true history."—Boston Courier. "A fresher, livelier account was never written of any hero of romance than of Andrew Jackson." "If the biography of Jackson there will be but one opinion in the present as to its merits. That it will be the standard and authorized historical books is indisputable."—Boston Gazette. "A work of intense and permanent interest."—New York Observer. "Mr. Parton is doing his work with an impartiality, candor, research and fidelity characteristic of narration which will make it at once popular with the people and with the scholar."—Boston Commonwealth. "The subject is in every way well adapted to the author. . . . The narrative is flowing and charming. We confess having read the whole four volumes at two successive sittings."—Harper's Weekly.

"Of the character of the work, and the manner in which the author has executed his difficult and laborious task, the American public has been accustomed to look for most emphatic and enthusiastic commendation."—New York Tribune.

Living Curiosities at Barnum's Museum.

Since Mr. P. T. BARNUM re-purchased the Museum last Spring, it has become more than ever a popular place of resort for Ladies, Children and Families, and the energies of that world-renowned "Prince of Showmen," seem to increase in a corresponding ratio with his patronage. Our artist has sketched the above from a host of other curiosities now on exhibition in the Museum at all hours, day and evening.

The two centre figures in the foreground of the above cut represent the celebrated AZTEC CHILDREN, found in one of the long lost cities of Central America. It will be observed that their cast of features, and very small heads, bear a striking resemblance to the sculpture found in those cities by Stephens and other travelers, which fact seems to indicate that the race of men to which they belong are the lineal descendants of the Aztecs.

The figure on the right-hand corner, is said to be found in the wilds of Africa, and is supposed to be a mixture of the wild man of the woods and the Ourang-outang, a kind of Man-Monkey, but for want of a positive name is called "WHAT IS IT?" The two white figures represent two ALBINO GIRLS, and the black one their black mother and sister. These Girls, though of black parentage, are a PURE WHITE, WITH WHITE WOOL AND PINK EYES, but with every other feature and characteristic of the real African. No one can look upon them without feeling the conviction that they are beyond all doubt WHITE NEGROES. All these extraordinary living wonders are on exhibition at

in this city, where everything novel and curious is sure to be found. In addition to the above, the Museum presents a combination of wonders and curiosities, unequaled in any part of the world. The GRAND AQUARIA show continues an attraction which well repays a visit. Here, in miniature Ocean, are to be found almost every variety of living Fish and other aquatic animals disporting in their native element, from a noble specimen of a living Seal, down to the tiny Stickleback, which builds its nest on the rocks and in the weeds. The HAPPY FAMILY, consists of beasts and birds of opposite natures, such as Dogs, Cats, Rats, Hawks, Chickens, Pigeons, &c., &c., all living in peace and harmony, and the whole made amusing and interesting by a number of lively and playful Monkeys, which always keep spectators in especial humor by their inimitable sports. A matinee free of admission, 50 in number, has just been added to the contained in this wonderful Museum. How so much can be afforded for the low price of twenty-five cents admission is only explained by the fact that an average of nearly four thousand persons visit the Museum daily; on holidays the number of visitors frequently exceeds twenty thousand.

850,000 Other Interesting Curiosities

VOL. IV.—No. 208.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

THE SECEDING SOUTH CAROLINA DELEGATION.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

THE SECEDING SOUTH CAROLINA DELEGATION.

We give on the preceding page portraits of the gentlemen originally accredited to the present Congress of the United States, as Senators and Representatives, from the State of South Carolina. The Senators did not take their seats at the commencement of this, the second session; those Representatives who were elected under the authority of the State Convention withdrew to attend its session, and when the new resolve of Washington has the State lawfully formally seceded from the Union the other gentlemen will retire from the capitol. Personally, as well as politically, this exodus from the national halls of legislation will be felt; for although some of the Palmetto delegation have at times cast their votes wrong in a party way, they leave no enemies behind them. Gallant gentlemen, with high endowments, manly attributes, and an intensity of devotion to patriotism has never even dared to glance, they carry with them kind wishes and sincere regrets, even of those who go so far as to believe that "secession is treason." Worthy successors of Calhoun, and Hayne, and M'Duffie, and Butler, and others who have in former years occupied the chairs may, or soon to be vacated, they turn from Presidents and parties, from Constitution and Union Congress, to acknowledge their allegiance to the Palmetto State, and to link their future destinies with her destiny.

JAMES H. HAMMOND is a native of the Barnwell District, South Carolina, where he was born on the 15th of November, 1807. His father was an officer of the State College, into which he entered, graduating with high honors in 1827. After studying law, he was admitted to the bar, and while he practiced with success, although he became more generally known as the writer of all editorial articles in the Augusta State Rights Sentinel and speeches expounded by John C. Calhoun. Elected in 1832 to the Twenty-fourth Congress, he gave proof of the most brilliant talents; but his health became enfeebled, and at the close of his term he went abroad, where he had an opportunity to study the workings of foreign governments. On his return home, in 1841, he was appointed general of the South Carolina troops, and the following year was elected Governor of the State. In 1844 he retired to his noble estate known as "Redcliffe," a fertile island in the Savannah River, about ten miles below Augusta, Georgia, where he devoted himself to literary and to agricultural pursuits. His articles to the English abolitionist, Clarkson, published in 1845, were extensively circulated, and his experiments in manuring land, deep plowing, the cultivation of sorgho, etc., are well known to agriculturists. In November, 1857, he was called from his retirement to fill the vacancy in the Senate of Jordan, who elected him a United States Senator, and on receiving the telegraphic announcement, he wrote as a return message—"I am grateful, I will accept, and I will do my duty." Appointed a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, he has been one of the most diligent Senators in attending to the public business, and has shown a liberal spirit in urging appropriations for the maintenance of our navy and of our navy-yards on a creditable footing. He is a firm believer in the Monroe doctrine that—to use his own words—"in all social systems there must be a class to do the menial duties, to perform the drudgery of life. That is a class requiring but a low order of intellect and but very little skill. Its requisites are vigor, docility, fidelity. Such a class you must have, or you would not have that other class which leads progress, civilization, and refinement. It constitutes the very mud-sill of society and of political government; and you might as well attempt to build a house in the air as to build either the one or the other except on this mud-sill. Fortunately for the South, she found a race adapted to that purpose to her hand—a race inferior to her own, perfectly qualified in temper, in vigor, in docility, in capacity, to stand this climate, to answer all her purposes. She found them slaves 'by the common consent of mankind,' which, according to Cicero, 'law natural,' the highest proof of what is nature's law."

JAMES CHESNUT was born about the year 1815, near Camden, South Carolina, at "Mulberry," the estate of his father, who is still alive, and who, after having served the Union some years, with threescore and ten years of age, has within a few months become an advocate of secession. James, after having enjoyed the advantages of a thorough classical academic education, entered Princeton college, where, at a Commencement, he became acquainted with Miss Kitty Cox, who is a Philadelphia by birth. In 1839 he was elected a member of the lower branch of the State Legislature, and continued to serve therein until 1852, taking high ground against separate State secession. In 1858 he was elected to the State Senate for the Kershaw district, as the candidate of those who desired to reform the "parish system;" but in the following year he became convinced that the time considered system was the correct one, and tendered his resignation, which his constituents refused to accept. Re-elected in 1856, he succeeded Governor Alston as the presiding officer of the Senate, and continued in the chair until—1858—he was chosen to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Judge Evans, United States Senator, and was subsequently elected to fill that position for the ensuing term. Naturally of a very temperament and chivalrous disposition, he has distinguished himself to act with the calm dignity of a statesman, and enjoys a high reputation for the accuracy of his information, the cogency of his logic, his energetic but unambitious eloquence, and his high-minded patriotism.

JOHN M'QUEEN, senior Representative on the Congressional roll, was born in Robinson County, North Carolina, in 1808, his father, James M'Queen (who was a nephew of Flora Macdonald, the guide of Prince Charlie), claiming descent in a direct line from Robert Bruce. After having graduated at Chapel Hill University, he commenced the study of law, and having removed to Marlborough Court House, South Carolina, was there admitted to the bar, and has since enjoyed a lucrative practice. Espousing the nullification doctrines, he was elected a Colonel of the State Volunteers in 1833, at time of a general armament, and rose to the rank of Major-General in 1835. In 1844 he became a candidate for Congress in opposition to Colonel Alexander D. Sims, but was defeated three successive times, after which he was elected, taking his seat in the House in 1849. Since then he has been successively re-elected, and is one of the oldest in will at once resign his seat in the Representatives. Politics are with him a matter of duty to his State, not a labor of love—a serious reality, not a mere pastime. Attentive to his duties, he never hesitates to express his opinions, giving utterance to the real sentiments of his mind—sentiments almost invariably suggested by his long experience as a Representative of South Carolina. Twice married, he has three sons and a daughter living, who are highly esteemed by his numerous acquaintances as a gallant, hospitable type of the "olden soldier."

WILLIAM PORCHER MILES was the accomplished Representative from his native city of Charleston, is one of those who have "greatness thrust upon them;" of Huguenot descent, he is identified with the patrician families of the Palmetto State, and took such high rank at the South Carolina bar immediately after graduating he was offered a Professor's chair. His heroic exploits at Norfolk, whither he hastened during the prevalence of the yellow fever, to devote himself to the sick, have already been chronicled in Harper's Weekly, together with his successful administration of the municipal government, when afterward chosen Mayor of Charleston. Elected to Congress in 1857, he was at first placed on the Committee on Commerce, and afterward on that on Foreign Affairs. His speeches, always on the conservative and partisan politics of the day, have been the theme of high encomium, and are models of congressional eloquence. The Author pays his tribute to him as his colleagues that South Carolina has been becoming more and more devoted to the principles of attachment to the Union; more and more familiarized with the idea of dissolution; more and more reconciled to the necessity of overthrowing and abolishing the General Government. Early in the debate on the admission of Kansas Mr. Miles asked Mr. Hale, in debate, if he could say that it was more natural than that the South should begin to look about her; . . . if it was more natural to look to her strength; to measure her capacity for taking care of herself, and of assuming, if driven out of the Confederacy, an independent position among the nations? Can she be reasonably blamed for doing so? And yet, whenever she looks this last imaginary—uncertainty in an independent state calmly and boldly in the face, and begins to discern in it a great and glorious destiny, . . . voices are forthwith stunned with the cry of 'treason!' 'treason!' and the august and mighty shade of the Father of his Country is invoked to the support of an evidence of disloyalty to this 'glorious Union.' Sir, Washington, with his great, wise heart, and luminous judgment, and unequaled patriotism, felt no compunctions at throwing off his allegiance to his King, and establishing a constitution and a form of government under which he had been reared, and which he had been taught to revere."

LAWRENCE M. KEITT was born in Orangeburg District, South Carolina, on the 27th of October, 1824, and of German descent. He received a thorough classical education, and after having graduated at the State University, in 1843, with the highest honors, he commenced the practice of law. In 1848 he was elected a member of the Legislature, and took an active part in State politics until 1853, when he was elected Representative to Congress, of which body he has since been an ornament, he also having been decided service tion than any one now a M.C., having a proclivity for style, rich in versatility, startling paradox, and copious expression. His speeches are also characteristically effective, made up of the extremes and ratio of ideas, and sparkle like the flashes of fire on the stage and go off in a tumult of applause, leaving an intoxicating sense of beauty and of daring, yet rather of the poetical order or a bold antithesis. Highly polished by education and refined social attrition, he possesses a winning affability of manners, and has the elements of making his State's sovereignty, in the happy husband of a most charming wife, the fond father of a lovely young daughter, and the esteemed friend of all who know him.

MILLEDGE L. BONHAM was born in Edgefield District, South Carolina, and is a descendant of the Butler family, which has given so many noble sons to the Palmetto State. After a thorough academic, classical education, he graduated at the State University, and subsequently studied the profession of law. He had a decided taste, however, for martial exercises, and was elected colonel of a cavalry regiment, defeating Gen. Hammond, a former Speaker of the House. Raised to the rank of Major-general, he devoted much time to the inspection and disciplining of his soldiery, and during the Mexican War he took the field at the head of a battalion of South Carolina volunteers. On his return he was elected Solicitor of the Southern Circuit, and he devoted himself to professional duties until after the death of Mr. Pickens and Hon. Colonel Preston S. Brooks, whose vacant seat he was elected to fill. His acquaintance with matters brought before the Committee on Military Affairs has made him a valuable member of that body, nor has he ever failed to participate in public discussions, frankly avowing and energetically defending the grounds of his public conduct.

JOHN D. AIKEN, native of Abbeyville District, South Carolina, in 1820, was deprived of his father early in life, and was forced by reverses of fortune to labor on his mother's farm for maintenance. With her fostering care, he managed, however, to acquire the rudiments of an education, and went when a youth to Sumpter District, where he was a clerk in a store, then a school-teacher, and then a practising lawyer, qualifying himself for each profession in advance. Preferring rural life, he afterward established himself as a planter with doubled success, and after holding commissions in the State militia, in 1844 he was elected to the State Legislature in 1848, and served until chosen Comptroller-General of the State in 1854. That, in South Carolina, is a position of high responsibility, as the incumbent has not only to attend to the collection and disbursement of the revenue, but likewise to examine the monthly reports of banking and other corporations, whose solvency is thus verified for the public good. It will be seen that this requires a comprehensive knowledge of business affairs, joined with habits of close application; and it is said that so satisfactorily were the multifarious duties performed by Colonel Ashmore, that during the four years' period of his service not an error, either of statement or of calculation, was found on his books. In 1857 he left the plantation in Sumpter County, owing to the ill health of his family there, and returned to his birth-place. Having, as we have stated, himself been trained he had never voted but at one election) when he was elected to Congress, where he has taken a conspicuous position. The people of South Carolina have evidently considers the display of oratorical power as of minor importance compared with the straightforward expression of his opinions in her behalf, and the devotion of his energies to her service. Retired from the bar with a wife and a family of intelligent children, he occupies a deservedly high social as well as political position among those with whom the secret struggle, to achieve high honors.

WILLIAM PORCHER MILES, born October 24, 1822, at Charleston, South Carolina was educated at the State University, and afterward at the University of Virginia. Admitted to the bar, he commenced the practice of his profession with success, and was in 1852 elected member of the State Legislature, and to look on the Union (Harper's Weekly, 1851), when he was foremost among those opposed to separate State secession. Chosen a member of the May Convention, composed of delegates elected in primary meetings, he was earnest in his resistance to the secession ordinance, and subsequently, as a letter to Governor Richardson, the presiding officer, he took the ground that it was not a deliberative assembly, but that it was controlled by the dominant party. In 1853 he was elected a Representative to Congress, where he has given repeated proofs of his high abilities as an orator and statesman. Few gentlemen on the American continent are as well versed in political economy, or as diligent students, as Mr. Boyce; while to powers of mind highly cultivated by study he unites oratorical talents of a high order.

THE DYING EAGLE.

Sick and sullen sat he in his eyrie:
Rock-bound twas, and girt with pine-trees wiry,
And the sun-flames, glaring fierce and fiery,
Scorched—but not his mood.
Far below the waves dashed, white with fury,
Every where.

His pinions blanched with sorrow—dreeping,
Sleigh him now the deadly swooping
On his enemies, in safety trooping
Near at hand;
But, with head bent downward, stared he ever
At the sand.

In the sand, ah, me! though changing ever—
Forming thoughts in atoms—but to sever
From them every hope for ever—
There read he
This sad story, from his lonely eyrie
By the sea.

How a fertile sea—a continent—from an age of wicked persecution
Sought to fashion out its refuge
To the end;
To win out a home, and build break, if need be,
But not bend.

How, again, successful, it grew daring—
Time's hard burdens chafing at—while bearing,
Till at last, of conflict not beswinging,
Still,
Hewing out a path, it took the place 'twas
Formed to fill.

Time rolled on: by heavenly sunbeams lighted,
Lo! the Union, from out the seed benighted,
Had grown up, and mutual faith had plighted,
Never, never
Should a jealous thought, a doubt, ev'er sever
Them forever.

Then another scene: that after ages,
Tracing in their time's historic pages,
Through its shadows, sorrow and mournful stages,
Should not fail
To impress by precept the dishonor
Of the tale.

In the rocks—surf-beaten, surely wearing—
In the white-capped waves so deadly bearing—
In the red sun setting, fiercely glaring,
Still,
All the horror—all the fierce convulsion
There he heard.

THE CHARITIES OF THE SEASON.

CHRISTMAS is upon us; and this year, we fear, it will bring a sense of sorrow in many a household. Political strife has proved so hurtful to business that thousands of people are out of employment, and will absolutely lack the necessaries of life this winter, if the charitable do not come to their aid. We hope that our benevolent fellow-citizens will not forget, in their holiday rejoicings, the wants of the poor.

Vast sums of money are spent every year in the purchase of expensive and useless toys for children; if half, or a quarter, of this amount were set apart this year for purposes of charity, a great deal of good might be done. The importers of toys expect a fact their business increases yearly, and that the cry is every year for more expensive and more elaborate toys. Twenty-year-old boys and girls deemed themselves fortunate if their parents spent fifty cents on Christmas gifts for each of them. Now five dollars will hardly purchase one of the tempting toys which are displayed in the shop windows. And hard as the times are, and dull as is business, we have a fact that the toy-shops in New York city were never more crowded with purchasers than they are at present.

Why should not parents take this opportunity of teaching children, practically, the duty of benevolence? Each boy or girl who chose to forego a Christmas gift or present, to be satisfied with one of moderate cost, might, by the sacrifice, make a poor family happy on Christmas-day, and provide five or six persons with a good dinner and a good fire. Would not the pleasure arising from such an act of kindness be more real and more lasting than any that could be afforded by the possession of a toy?

THE LOUNGER.

CARDINAL RICHELIEU.

THE scene suddenly drew apart, and there in his library sat Cardinal Richelieu, sunk in a huge easy-chair of dark oak, which was covered with papers. The friar Joseph, his confessor and familiar, stood at his back. Richelieu and Cardinal as one fancies him. His scarlet robe and lace half-skirt (what is the name of it?) were covered with a downcast vapour. He had the red cloth-cap upon his head, and the long gray hair straggled from beneath it and fell upon his shoulders. Upon the forefinger of his left hand he wore the ring, and his fiery eye revealed the soul that struggled with the disease which shook his slight frame with its cough. The room was vaulted, and there were shelves of books.

When the Cardinal began to converse he did it in the most elaborate manner, and with much gesture. The spell of his appearance was a little disturbed by the speech; for while he looked Richelieu he talked Bulwer. As he went on there was no incessant play of the features, and the continued movement of the arms, showing that the Cardinal was a very nervous man. He intoned rather than spoke what he had to say. The ear was a little wearied by the extreme daintiness of the pronunciation. But when De Mauprat came in, there was some measure tongue-fence until the youth was led off to happiness. Later, when the Cardinal is dead, his chamber at midnight, and De Mauprat bursts in and is conquered by the old minister's self-possession, he tells the youth how he has done, and what he has done for France. But after the declamation is over, one asks himself, "Is that the way in which Cardinal Richelieu talks?" to a single audience.

During the following scenes in the garden of the palace, the contrast between the utter prostration of the old man, and the fury with which he turns upon Barradas and threatens to launch the curse of the Church, is very great and well-done. So at the close, when he has resigned his office and asks a boon in vain, the exhaustion of the body and mind for a while takes away the sense of the soul; but it flames out again upon the return of the packet, and the mature vigor of the man reasserts its influence as the great Cardinal is withdrawn from sight.

Somehow he has not impressed you as the man of consummate political genius you have always supposed him to be. Somehow, the Cardinal Minister of State seems to have been ranting. At times the appearance, the attitude, the voice, are all that Richelieu's may have been; then the charm is broken, and you are not held nor constrained to attend and be interested.

Well, you can not ask yourself, as you pick your humble way through the slop and filth of the —if you had seen an old man quietly talking and acting, as such men do, in such moments as these, repressed generally so speak and act, would it have been a spectacle that a thousand people would pay a half dollar to see? Great men are spoiled not by the declamation of their talk nor by the picturesqueness of situations and vehement movement. They are spoiled by the same means. Vividly poor are ordinary men; and hence the proverb that no man is a hero to his valet. It means that the valet is not apt to see him in the heroics.

Do you understand that we are speaking of Edwin Booth as Richelieu; and that, for once, our seeing him but one? It is true that the talk is Bulwer's trituration of the minister. It is Armand de Richelieu Bulwer's version; but it somewhat like the Le Creole Pêcheur, à la Racine. But if you remember, Rachel never played Racine, not the French, Does Booth give the historian or the Bulwerian Richelieu? In impression, I mean, of course, because the words must be the author's. Thus, too, with such people to support him!

If you look closely, dear critic, you will find, after all your shrugs and skeptical sighs are said, that this is a man of great promise. He is not yet great. He has not perfectly mastered himself. He even tripped in the text once; only once—yes, and he was brave enough to correct himself—that is to say, to teach himself; and the young actor who will do that may do any thing. When, with more experience, he shall dare to delineate great man as great man historically are, and not as they traditionally are in the theatre—when he shall dare to trust to the sublime severity and simplicity of nature, as he does fully in parts even now—and all this he is the man to do—then the performance will be as fine as the promise, and the greatness of Booth's father shall be rivaled and surpassed only by the greatness of Booth's son.

ROMANCE IN REALITY.

THE essential romance of Garibaldi's character has been often enough observed by those who narrowly watch his career; but a recent incident in his life, if it be true, is one of the most touching and beautiful in modern history. It may not be true, but we hope it is. It would hardly be possible in England or France or America, but in Italy, where romance survives and people are not ashamed of it, it is just necessarily impossible.

Then again if it be not true, the readiness with which we believe it is a right fact, as showing light upon our real estimate of the men who lead the great Italian movement of the hour. There are a great many men in the world who would not naturally believe what is picturesque or poetic, however it may respect facts. But Italy, in this instance, could easily be conceived as the hero of a romance; no, nor even his friend Louis Napoleon. On the other hand, Kossuth and Mazzini, Lamartine would belong rather to the department of moderns than romance.

The story of which we are speaking is of the return of Garibaldi to his island of Caprera. The island is almost in sight of Nice, and Garibaldi arrived there in the simplest and roughest manner. But upon his recent return to it after parting with King Victor Emanuel at Naples, a parting which was said to have been for some reasons not altogether friendly, he stepped ashore to resume his rough life in his rude cottage and primitive farm, when a kind magician seemed to have been before him.

Pleasant and well made roads and paths instead of the old ways; cultivated fields instead of the half wilderness; fences in place of thickets, and a neat, simple, graceful villa instead of the old one, saluted his wondering eyes. But passing through the miraculous change into the villa, he found its rooms stately and amply furnished, and upon the parlor wall a portrait of the King with the legend upon the frame, "VICTOR EMANUEL to his friend Garibaldi."

It is not a pretty story, and ought it not to be true? Yet, and might it not easily be true from what we know of the two men? Certainly, as we were saying last week of the heroism and softness of the letter written upon the island, there is really no need of going beyond the newspapers for tales of the grave and beautiful qualities that make the epics of the world.

A STATUE.

OF all the handsome cities that cluster about the great lakes Cleveland is, for some reasons, the prettiest of all. It was long ago called the Forest City, from the multitude of beautiful trees that shade its streets; and from its commanding bluff it looks across the little Erie ocean, which dashes along the shore with the fury of the Mediterranean. Its broad streets, and stately buildings, and quietly-busy aspect, impart a peculiar elegance to Cleveland which the bustling border hardly expects to find. And as he lounges along the main thoroughfare he emerges upon a public square, upon which stand the new Post-office and the Court-house building; the latter of which is one of the neatest and most symmetrical public buildings which a Lounger sees in much wandering.

As he strolls through the square he observes that the grass is in the one middle of the area on the Battery in the city of New York—grass in grass, perhaps, certainly not in ease; but the trees are not cut down, the walks are bordered with leaves in summer, that he may justly excuse the grass for having its home in the soil and living on all idea of growing. There is perhaps a covered booth, or platform, for political speeches; but as the Lounger sees it, it is full of rubbish, carpenters, and, in fragments, mentally exclaims: "Cleveland! Lake Erie! Bless my soul! Commodore Perry! Lake Erie! Cleveland!—Activation! and lo! before him, raised at a modest height above the ground, stands upon its pedestal Walcott's statue of Perry.

If the Lounger happen to be a Rhode Islander he looks at the figure, and, with a natural interest, recalling the house upon the Parade in Newport, where Perry lived; and then looking toward the lake, his fancy wanders to Portsmouth. It is highly probable that he will look in the wrong direction, and may perhaps be disappointed at not being natural then to suppose that the broad street down which the figure gazes leads straight to the water. So it does, but not to Portsmouth.

"Why," said the Lounger, speaking under this delusion—"why does he look toward the lake, and turn over his left arm to point to the heart of the city, and point to the lake?"

"It is precisely what he is doing," replied the citizen of Cleveland.

And he then explained that the broad street is really pointing to the lake, and that one of the figure which points sideways down another wide street is really pointing to the water.

The novelist will remember that at the time of the anniversary of the battle of Lake Erie, in September, there was a poem by a popular writer in Harper's Weekly. It is a figure full of animation and action. The naval costume of the time is represented, and the commander stands in the excitement of victory—the moment when the words he afterward uttered became true—"We have met the enemy, and they are ours." The lake is great upon in the attitude and action. The face is according to his humorous poetry—it is not serious, but festivally as you look at it you are reminded of the days which made the glory of the country, and you dream of a better national glory achieved by more peaceful means.

Then your eye wanders toward the lake. You do not see it, you see the fleet sailing down to the very edge of the street below which you know the great sea stretches away. The echoes of the battle has blown over, long years ago. The roar and struggle are quiet now. And in his hand, as he looks and sees, the Lounger perhaps holds a newspaper which tells of the happy return of a Prince of Wales from a tour in a foreign land which has awakened every where the love that has welcomed and honored him as a friend. The smoke of the old battle seems in that moment to rise and brighten into a halo—the roar dies into fraternal music; and as the stars come out and shine upon the fated Erie, the memories which mingle with it are before what they always are afterward, and forget the arbitrament of war.

ANOTHER!

IT is a question whether man may not be defined as an animal that turns things into the ground. And if the definition be not quite true, that the history of periodical literature in England, there could be no possible doubt that it would soon be so. Single fish-like things men are ceasing, as it were, to be authors, and are becoming editors. To be sure editors are usually authors, but the distinction is sufficiently appreciable.

The old magazines in England apparently perish in a humorous manner. They "fade away" again out. The spirit of the literature of the day was quite beyond them, and very properly. Their aim is the improvement of that spirit, and nothing could be more widely separated from the regular and systematic flow of literature than such a single kind than the tone of his books. Theodore Hook, for instance, was the very antipodes in tone, spirit, and manner of Charles Dickens.

The Household Words was, in periodical literature, inspired by the same difference. It was the first of a series of periodicals that came into the stories, because it was addressed to a different purpose and audience. But it had the same kind of significance and earnestness. It took the field while the older magazines were still in possession, but it left them in the hands of their

WON.

A START—a pause—a flutter and a sigh.
A voice that trembles in the common greeting;
The hurried clasp of an unsteady hand,
That once was frankly offered at your meeting.

I saw you, little Annie—yes, I know,
He's Charlie's friend, just landed from Bengal,
He's very fond of Charlie, ah! and so
He staid till last at Charlie's sister's ball.

You danced eight times together—am I right
"He's such a perfect waltzer"—nothing more?
You met a week ago this very night,
And I have—known you all your lifetime o'er!

Forgive me that I played the listner, dear,
And heard him win your love, among your flowers;
You had forgotten I was prisoned here,
A poor lone cripple all these festive hours.

He's very winsome, honest-eyed, and tall,
The cross for valor's roll contains his story.
On my pale-stricken brow no wreath will fall,
I reap in Life's grim battle all but glory.

Dearie, don't kneel, and hide those kind gray eyes,
I am not grieving, look me in the face.
Why, who am I, that I should claim the prize,
Who never could have started in the race?

He's waiting for you, Annie—leave me now
Alone with what must be a happy past.
A brother's kiss I claim upon your brow,
God bless you, Annie! 'tis my first—and last.

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

CHAPTER VIII.

MR. PUMBLECHOOK'S premises in the High Street of the market town were of a pepper-corny and farinaceous character, as the premises of a corn-chandler and seedsman should be. It appeared to me that he must be a very happy man indeed to have so many little drawers in his shop; and I wondered when I peeped into one or two on the lower tiers, and saw the tied-up brown paper packets inside, whether the flower-seeds and bulbs ever wanted of a fine day to break out of those jails and bloom.

It was in the early morning after my arrival that I entertained this speculation. On the previous night I had been sent straight to bed in an attic with a sloping roof, which was so low in the corner where the bedstead was that I calculated the tiles as being within a foot of my eyebrows. In the same early morning I discovered a singular affinity between seeds and corduroys. Mr. Pumblechook wore corduroys, and so did his shopman; and somehow there was a general air and flavor about the corduroys, so much in the nature of seeds, and a general air and flavor about the seeds, so much in the nature of corduroys, that I hardly knew which was which. The same opportunity served me for noticing that Mr. Pumblechook appeared to conduct his business by looking across the street at the saddler, who appeared to transact his business by keeping his eye on the coach-maker, who appeared to get on in life by putting his hands in his pockets and contemplating the baker, who in his turn folded his arms and stared at the grocer, who stood at his door and yawned at the chemist. The watchmaker, always poring over a little desk with a magnifying glass at his eye, and always expected by a group in smock-frocks poring over him through the glass of his shop-window, seemed to be about the only person in the High Street whose trade engaged his attention.

Mr. Pumblechook and I breakfasted at eight o'clock in the parlor behind the shop, while the shopman took his mug of tea and hunch of bread-and-butter on a sack of peas in the front premises. I considered Mr. Pumblechook wretched company. Besides being possessed by my sister's idea that a mortifying and penitential character ought to be imparted to my diet—besides giving me as much crumb as possible in combination with as little butter, and putting such a quantity of warm water into my milk that it would have been more candid to have left the milk out altogether—his conversation consisted of nothing but arithmetic. On my politely bidding him Good-morning, he said, promptly, "Seven times nine, boy?" And how should I be able to answer, dodged in that way, in a strange place, on an empty stomach! I was hungry, but before I had swallowed a morsel he began a running sum that lasted all through the breakfast. "Seven?" "And four?" "And eight?" "And six?" "And two?" "And ten?" And so on. And after each figure was disposed of, it was as much as I could do to get a bite or a sip before the next came; while he sat at his ease gnessing nothing and eating bacon and hot roll in (if I may be allowed the expression) a gorging and gormandizing manner.

For such reasons I was very glad when ten o'clock came and we started for Miss Havisham's; though I was not at all at my ease regarding the manner in which I should acquaint myself under that lady's roof. Within a quarter of an hour we came to Miss Havisham's house, which was of old brick, and dismal, and had a great many iron bars to it. Some of the windows had been walled up; of those that remained all the lower were rusty barred. There was a court-yard in front, and that was barred also; so we had to wait, after ringing the bell, until some one should come to open it. While we waited at the gate I peeped in (even then Mr. Pumblechook said, "Seven times seven") but I pretended not to hear him), and saw that at the side of the house there was a large brewery; no brewing was going on in it, and none seemed to have gone on for a long long time.

A window was opened, and a clear voice demanded "What name?" To which my conductor replied "Pumblechook." The voice returned "Quite right," and the window was shut again, and a young lady came across the court-yard with keys in her hand.

"This," said Mr. Pumblechook, "is Pip."

"This is Pip, is it?" returned the young lady, who was very pretty and seemed very proud: "Come in, Pip."

Mr. Pumblechook was coming in also, when she stopped him with the gate.

"Oh!" she said. "Did you wish to see Miss Havisham?"

"If Miss Havisham wishes to see me," returned Mr. Pumblechook, discomfited.

"Ah!" said the girl; "but you see she don't."

She said it so finally, and in such an undiscussible way, that Mr. Pumblechook, though in a condition of ruffled dignity, could not protest. But he eyed me severely—as if I had done any thing to him!—and departed with the words reproachfully delivered: "Boy! Let your behavior here be a credit unto them which brought you up by hand!" I was not free from apprehension that he would come back to propound through the gate, "And sixteen?" But he didn't.

My young conductress locked the gate, and we went across the court-yard. It was paved and clean, but grass was growing in every crevice. The brewery buildings had a little air of communication with it, and the wooden gates of that part stood open, and all the brewery beyond stood open, away to the high inclosing wall, and all was empty and disused. The cold wind seemed to blow colder there than outside the gate, and it made a shrill noise in howling in and out at the open sides of the brewery, like the noise of wind in the rigging of a ship at sea.

She saw me looking at it, and she said, "You could drink without hurt all the strong beer that's brewed there now, boy."

"I should think I could, miss," said I, in a shy way.

"Better not try to brew beer there now, or it would turn out sour, boy; don't you think so?"

"It looks like it, miss."

"Not that any body means to try," she added, "for that's all done with, and the place will stand as idle as it is till it falls. As to strong beer, there's enough of it in the cellars already to drown the Manor House."

"Is that the name of this house, miss?"

"One of its names, boy."

"It has more than one, then, miss?"

"One more. Its other name was Satis, which is Greek, or Latin, or Hebrew, or all three—or all one to me—for enough."

"Enough House," said I; "that's a curious name, miss."

"Yes," she replied; "but it meant more than it said. It meant, when it was given, that whoever had this house could want nothing else. They must have been easily satisfied in those days, I should think. But don't loiter, boy."

Though she called me "boy" so often, and with a carelessness that was far from complimentary, she was of about my own age—or very little older. She seemed much older than I, of course, being a girl, and beautiful and self-possessed; and she was as scornful of me as if she had been one-and-twenty, and a queen.

We went into the house by a side door—the great front entrance had two chains across it outside—and the first thing I noticed was, that the passages were all dark, and that she had left a candle burning there. She took it up, and we went through many passages and up a staircase, and still it was all dark, and only the candle lighted us.

At last we came to the door of a room, and she said, "Go in."

I answered, more in shyness than politeness, "After you, miss."

To this, she returned: "Don't be ridiculous, boy; I am not going in." And scornfully walked away, and—what was worse—took the candle with her.

This was very uncomfortable, and I was half afraid. However, the only thing to be done being to knock at the door, I knocked, and was told from within to enter. I entered, therefore, and found myself in a pretty large room well lighted with wax candles. No glimpse of daylight was to be seen in it. It was a dressing-room, as I supposed from the furniture, though much of it was of forms and uses then quite unknown to me. But prominent in it was a draped table with a gilded looking-glass, and that I made out at first sight to be a fine lady's dressing-table.

Whether I should have made out this object so soon if there had been no fine lady sitting at it I can not say. In an arm-chair, before an elbow resting on the table and her head leaning on that hand, sat the strangest lady I have ever seen, or shall ever see.

She was dressed in rich materials—satins, and lace, and silks—all of white. Her shoes were white. And she had a long white veil dependent from her hair, and she had bridal flowers in her hair, but her hair was white. Some bright jewels sparkled on her neck and on her hands, and some other jewels lay sparkling on the table. Dresses, less splendid than the dress she wore, and half-packed trunks, were scattered about. She had not quite finished dressing, for she had but one shoe on—the other was on the table near her hand—her veil was but half arranged, her watch and chain were not put on, and some lace for her bosom lay with those trinkets, and with her handkerchief, and gloves, and some flowers, and a prayer-book, all confusedly heaped about the looking-glass.

It was not in the first minute that I saw all these things, though I was more of them in the first minute than might be supposed. But I saw that every thing within my view which ought to be white had been white long ago, and had lost its lustre, and was faded and yellow. I saw that the bride within the bridal dress had withered like the dress, and like the flowers, and had no brightness left but the brightness of her sunken eyes. I saw that the dress had been put upon the rounded figure of a young woman, and that the figure upon which it now hung loose had shrunk to skin and bone. Once, I had been taken to see some ghastly wax-work at the Fair, representing I know not what impossible personage lying in state. Once, I had been taken to one of our old marsh churches to see a skeleton in the nave of a rich dress that had been dug out of a vault under the church pavement. Now, wax-work and skeleton seemed to have dark eyes that moved and looked at me. I should have cried out if I could.

"Who is it?" said the lady at the table.

"Pip, ma'am."

"Pip?"

"Mr. Pumblechook's boy, ma'am. Come—to play."

"Come nearer; let me look at you. Come close."

It was when I stood before her, avoiding her eyes, that I took note of the surrounding objects in detail, and saw that her watch had stopped at twenty minutes to nine, and that a clock in the room had stopped at twenty minutes to nine.

"Look at me," said Miss Havisham. "You are not afraid of a woman who has never seen the sun since you were born?"

I regret to state that I was not afraid of telling the enormous lie comprehended in the answer "No."

"Do you know what I touch here?" she said, laying her hands, one upon the other, on her left side.

"Yes, ma'am." (It made me think of the young man.)

"What do I touch?"

"Your heart."

"Broken!"

She uttered the word with an eager look, and with strong emphasis, and with a weird smile that had a kind of boast in it. Afterward, she kept her hands there for a little while, and slowly took them away as if they were heavy.

"I am tired," said Miss Havisham. "I want diversion, and I have done with men and women. Play."

I think it will be conceded by my most disputatious reader that she could hardly have directed an unfortunate boy to do any thing in the wide world more difficult to be done under the circumstances.

"WHO IS IT?" SAID THE LADY AT THE TABLE. "PIP, MA'AM."

"I sometimes have sick fancies," she went on, "and I have a sick fancy that I want to see some play. There, there!" with an impatient movement of the fingers of her right hand; "play, play, play!"

For a moment, with the fear of my sister's wrath before me very eyes, I had a desperate idea of starting round the room in the assumed character of Mr. Punblechook's cheerful boy. But I felt myself so unequal to the performance that I gave it up, and stood looking at Miss Havisham in what I suppose she took for a dispassionate manner, inasmuch as she said, when we had taken a good look at each other:

"Are you dumb and obstinate?"

"No, ma'am, I am very sorry for you, and very sorry I can't play just now. If you were a little use I shall get into trouble with my sister, so I would do it if I could; but it's no use here, and so good-by!" and I made a modest curtsy.

"Good-by," I stopped, fearing I might say too much, or had already said it, and we took another look at each other.

Before she spoke again she turned her eyes from me, and looked at the dress she wore, and at the dressing-table, and finally at herself in the looking-glass.

"So new to him," she muttered, "so old to me; so strange to him, so familiar to me; so melancholy to both of us! Call Estella."

As she stood looking at the reflection of herself, I thought she was still talking to herself, and kept quiet.

"Call Estella," she repeated, flashing a look at me. "You can do that. Call Estella. At the door."

To stand in the dark in a mysterious passage of an unknown house bawling Estella to a scornful young lady whose ruthless manner inspired me feeling it a dreadful liberty so to roar out her name, was almost as bad as playing beggar my neighbor. But she answered at last, and her light came along the long dark passage like a star.

Miss Havisham took her candle, came close, and took up a jewel from the table, and tried its effect upon her fair young bosom and against her pretty brown hair. "How does it look, boy, my dear, and you will use it well. Let me see you play cards with this boy."

"With this boy! Why, he is a common laboring boy!"

I thought I overheard Miss Havisham answer —only it seemed so unlikely—" Well? You can break his heart."

"What do you play, boy?" asked Estella of the stolid face and the greatest disdain.

"Nothing but beggar my neighbor, miss."

"Beggar him," said Miss Havisham to Estella. So we sat down to cards.

It was very odd to understand that every thing in the room had stopped, like the watch and the clock, a long time ago. I noticed that Miss Havisham put down the jewel exactly in the spot from which she had taken it up. As Estella dealt the cards I glanced at the dressing-table again, and saw that the shoe upon it, once white, now yellow, had been trodden ragged. Without this shred of every thing on the dressing-table still on it, and the pale decayed objects, not even the withered bridal dress on the collapsed form could have looked so like grave-clothes, or the long veil so like a shroud.

So she sat corpse-like, as we played at cards: the frillings and trimmings on her bridal dress looking like earthy paper, and as if they would crumble into dust also. I knew nothing then of the discoveries that are occasionally made of bodies buried in ancient times, which fall to powder in the moment of being distinctly seen; but I have often thought since that she must have looked as if the admission of the natural light of day would have struck her to dust.

"He calls the knaves Jacks, this boy!" said Estella, with disdain, before our first game was out. "And what coarse hands he has! And what thick boots!"

I had never thought of being ashamed of my hands before; but I began to consider them a very indifferent pair. Her contempt was so strong that it became infectious, and I caught it.

She won the game, and I dealt. I misdealt, as was only natural, when I knew she was lying in wait for me to do wrong, and she denounced me for a stupid, clumsy laboring boy.

"You say nothing of her," remarked Miss Havisham to me, as she looked on. "She says many hard things of you, but you say nothing of her. What do you think of her?"

"I don't like to say," I stammered.

"Tell me in my ear," said Miss Havisham, bending down.

"I think she is very proud," I replied, in a whisper.

"Any thing else?"

"I think she is very pretty."

"Any thing else?"

"I think that is very insulting." (She was looking at me, then, with a look of supreme derision.)

"Any thing else?"

"I think I should like to go home."

"And leave her again, though she is so pretty?"

"I am not sure that I shouldn't like to see her again, but I should like to go home now."

"You shall go soon," said Miss Havisham, aloud. "Play the game out."

Saving for the one weird smile at first, I should have felt almost sure that Miss Havisham's face could not smile. It had dropped into a watchful and brooding expression—most likely when all the things about her had become transfixed —and it looked as if nothing could ever lift it up any more. Her chest had dropped, so that she stooped; and her voice had dropped, so that she spoke low, and with a dead lull upon her; altogether she had the appearance of having dropped, body and soul, within and without, under the weight of a crushing blow.

I played the game to an end with Estella, and she beggared me. She threw the cards down on the table when she had won the game all, as if she despised them for having been won of me.

"When shall I have you to play again?" said Miss Havisham. "Let me think."

I was beginning to remind her that to-day was Wednesday, when she impatiently stopped me with her impatient movement of the fingers of her right hand.

"There, there! I know nothing of days of the week; I know nothing of weeks of the year. Come again three days. You hear?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Estella, take him down. Let him have something to eat, and drink, and let him look about him while he eats it. Go. Pip."

I followed the candle down as I had followed the candle up, and found it in the place where we had found it. Until she opened the door, she kept it in her hand, without thinking about it; that it most necessarily be night time. The rush of the daylight quite confounded me, and made me feel as if I had been in the candle-light of the strange room many hours.

"You are to wait here, you boy," said Estella, and disappeared, and locked the door.

I took the opportunity of being alone in the courtyard to look at my coarse hands and my common boots. My opinion of those accessories was not favorable. They had never troubled me before, but they troubled me now as vile appendages. I determined to ask Joe why he had ever taught me to call those pictures-cards Jacks which ought to be called Knaves. I wished, and had been rather more genteelly brought up, and wished I should like to play.

She came back with some bread and meat and a little mug of beer. She put the mug down on a stone bench in the yard, and gave me bread and meat without looking at me, as insolently as if I were a dog. I was so humiliated, hurt, offended, affected, angry, and ashamed, that upon the right name for the smart—God knows what it was—welling up within me, I put my eyes. The moment they sprang there the girl looked at me with a quick delight in having been the cause of them. I drank a little beer to force them back and to look at her; so she gave a contemptuous toss—but with a sense, I thought, of having made too sure that I was so vanquished. and left me.

But when she was gone I looked about me for a place to hide my face in, and got behind one of the gates in the brewery-lane, and leaned my sleeve against the wall there, and my forehead on it and cried. As I cried I kicked the wall and took a hard twist at my hair; so that there were two pains in action when Estella came softly round the corner, that needed counteraction.

My sister's bringing up had made me sensitive. In the little world in which children have their existence, whether they get it up, I am convinced there is nothing so finely perceived and so finely felt as injustice. It may be only a small injustice that the child can be exposed to; but the child is small, and its world is small, and its sticking-plaster of patience is proportioned according to scale, as a big-boned Irish hunter. Within myself I had sustained from my babyhood a perception that my sister's hand was not known from the time when I could speak that my sister, in her capacious and violent nature, was unjust to me. That fleshly tenement, with its one impregnable wall, and existing them out of my hair, and then I smoothed my face with my sleeve and came from behind the gate. The coast was clear, was acceptable, and the beer was warming and tingling, and I was sensible of an light sensation.

To be sure it was a deserted place, down to the pigeon-house in the brewery-yard, which had been blown out of window, as to allow of their high wind, and would have made the pigeons think themselves at sea, if there had been any pigeons there to be cooked for it. There were no pigs, no pigsons in the dove-cot, no horses in the stable, no pigs in the sty, no malt in the storehouse, no smells of grains and beer in the cellar or the vat. All the uses and scents of the brewery might have ceased forever in the world, and the brewery would not have known the want. Now, in a by-yard there was a wilderness of empty casks, which had a certain sour remembrance of better days lingering about them, but it was too sour to be accepted as a sample of the beer that was gone—and in this respect I remember those recluses as being like real ones.

Behind the farthest end of the brewery was a rank garden with an old red wall: not so high but that I could struggle up and hold on long enough to look over it, and which the rank garden was the garden of the house, and that it was overgrown with tangled weeds, but that there was a track upon the green and yellow paths, as if some one sometimes walked there, and that Estella was walking away from me even then. But she seemed to be every where. For when I yielded to the temptation presented by the casks, and began to walk on them, I saw her walking on them at the end of the yard of casks. She looked at me for a moment, and her pretty brown hair spread out in her two hands, and never looked round, and passed out of my view directly. So in the brewery itself—by which I mean the large paved lofty place in which they used to make the beer, and where the brewing utensils still were. When I first went into it, rather oppressed by its gloom, stood near the door looking about me, I saw her pass across the extinguished fires, and ascend some light iron stairs, and go out by an iron gallery high overhead, as if she were going out into the sky.

It was in this place, and at this moment, that a strange thing happened to my fancy. It seemed to me that the building then, and I thought it stranger long afterward. I turned my eyes a little dimmed by looking up at the frosty light—from a great wooden beam in a low nook of the building near me on my right hand, and I saw a figure hanging there by a rope. A figure all in yellow white, with but one shoe to the feet; and it hung so that I could see that the face was turned toward the dress were like earthy paper, and that the face was Miss Havisham's with the eyes open, and with a movement going over it, as if she were trying to get them crying to call to me. In the terror of seeing the figure, and in the terror of being certain that it had not been there a moment before, I at first ran from it, and then ran toward it. And my fright was greatest of all when I found no figure there.

Nothing less than the frosty light of the chemical sky, the sight of people passing beyond the bars of the court-yard gate, and the reviving influence of beer, which I took in great draughts and beer, would have brought me round. Even with those aids I might not have come to myself as I did, but for finding Miss Estella approaching with the keys to let me out. She would have some fair reason for looking down upon me, I thought, if she found me frightened; and she should have no fair reason.

She gave me a triumphant glance in passing me, as if she rejoiced that my hands were so coarse and my boots were so thick, and she opened the door and stood holding it. I was passing out without looking at her, when she touched me with a taunting hand.

"Why don't you cry?" said she.

"Because I don't want to," said I.

"You do want to," she said. "You have been crying, and you are near crying again."

She laughed contemptuously, pushed me out, and locked the door upon me. I went straight to Mr. Pumblechook's, and was immensely relieved to find him not at home. So, leaving word with the shopman on what day I was wanted at Miss Havisham's again, I set off on the four-mile walk to my home; pondering, as I went along, on all I had seen, and deeply revolving that I was a common laboring boy, that my hands were coarse, that my boots were thick, that I had fallen into a despicable habit of calling knaves Jacks, that I was much more ignorant than my companions, and that I had taken pretty kindly to the life I had led, and was in a low-lived bad way.

A DAY'S RIDE.

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER,

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

I COULD not hear the loud and repeated knockings which were made at my door, as at first waiters, and then the landlord himself, endeavored to get admittance. At length a ladder was placed at the window, and a courageous individual, duly armed, appeared at my casement and summoned me to surrender. With what unspeakable relief did I learn that it was not to apprehend or arrest me that all these measures were taken; they were simply the preparations of a graceful benevolence, a sort of rumored intimation how much I was to blame for having prussic acid, or was being done to death by charcoal. Imagine a prisoner in a condemned cell suddenly informed that the cruel sentence had been carried him consisted not of the ordinary, the sheriff, the chaplain, &c., but a deputation of respectable citizens come to offer the representation of their borough or a piece of plate, and think you that the mere conception of the pleasant revulsion of my feelings. I thanked my public in a short but appropriate address. I remember, although there was a popular prejudice about doing this sort of thing in November in England, that I seemed quite unseasonable at other times, and that really in these days of domestic arsenic and conjugal strychnine, nothing but considerable impatience would make a man self-destructive—suicide arguing that as man was really so utterly valueless it was much politic while to get rid of him. My explanation over, I ordered breakfast.

"Why not dinner?" said the waiter. "It is close on four o'clock."

"No," said I; "the ladies will expect me at dinner."

"The ladies are near Constance by this, or else the roads are worse than we thought them."

"Constance!" said I, "do you mean to say they have gone?"

"Yes, sir, at daybreak; or, indeed, I might say before daybreak."

"Gone! actually gone?" was all that I could utter.

"They never went to bed last night, Sir; the old lady was taken very ill after tea, and all the house running here and there for doctors and remedies, and the young lady, though she bore up so well, they tell me she fainted when she was alone in her own room. In fact, it was a piece of confusion and trouble until they started, and, we may say, none of us had a moment's peace till we saw them off."

"And how came it that I was never called?"

"I believe, Sir, but I'm not sure, the landlord tried to awake you. At all events, he has a note for you now, for I saw the old lady place it in his hand."

"Fetch it at once," said I; and when he left the room I threw some water over my face and tried to rally all my faculties to meet the occasion.

When the waiter reappeared with the note I took him hastily from the table; I did not venture to rend it while he was in the room. At length he went away, and I opened it. These were the words:

"SIR,—When a personage of your rank abuses the privilege of his station, it is supposed that he means to rebuke. Although innocent of any cause for present displeasure, I have thought to withdraw myself from your notice than incur the chance of so severe a reprimand a second time.

"I am, Sir, with undiminished sorrow and humility, your most devoted follower and servant,

"MARTHA KEATES.

"To the —— de ——."

This was the whole of it; not a great deal as correspondence, but matter enough for much meditation and much misery. After a long and painful review of my conduct, one startling fact stood prominently forward, which was, that I had done something by which, if I been the act of a royal prince, would yet have been unpardonable, but which, as I knew to emanate from one such as myself, would have been a downright outrage.

I went into the whole case as a man who detests figures might have gone into a long and complicated account; and just as he would skip small sums, and pay little heed to it records, aimed at arriving at some grand solid balance for or against myself.

I felt that if asked to produce my books they might run this wise: Potts, on the credit side, a philanthropist, self-denying, generous and trustful; one eager to do good, thinking no evil of his neighbor, and full of every hope anxious to establish that brotherhood among men which however varied the station, could and ought to subsist, and which needs but the connecting link of one sympathetic existence to establish. On the other side, Potts, I grieve to say, appeared that which he continued Menelaus Potts, dear and to be.

When I had rallied a bit from the stunning effect of this disagreeable "total," I began to wish that I had somebody to argue the matter out with me. The best way I could see my case would be thus: "Has not—from the time of Quintus Curtius down to the late Mr. Sadlier, of banking celebrity—the sacrifice of one man for the benefit of his fellows been recognized as the noblest exposition of heroism? Now, although it is terrible to give up life for the attainment of others, it is far more to surrender one's identity, to expunge that original figure I had which gives a man his self-esteem and suggests his self-preservation. And who, I would ask, feels this so deeply as the man who has irrevocably palms himself upon the world for that which he is not? According to the present hegemonic principle, this man may be a real boon to humanity. He feeds this one with hope, the other with flattery; he bestows courage on the weak, confidence on the wavering. The rich man can give of his abundance; but it is out of his very poverty this poor fellow has to bestow all. Like the spider, he has to weave his web for his own meals, and like the same spider he may be swept away by some pretentious affectation of propriety."

While I thus argued the waiter came in to serve dinner. It looked all appetizing and nice, but I could not touch a morsel. I was sick at heart. Every old country seat took an air around the room was ever before me. Those dark gray walls—with you stupid folk will go on calling blue—have a sort of reproachful power in them very remarkable. They don't flash out in anger like bricks, or speckle in displeasure like heast; but they emit a sort of stendy, fixed, concentrated light that seems to imply that they have looked respectably into you, and come back very sad and very sorry for the inquiry. I thought of those happy days I passed beside her; I recalled her low and gentle voice, her sweet half-sad smile, and her playful laugh, and I said, "How I lost all these through a boy! What stupid folly possessed me last evening? How could I have been so idiotic as not to see that I was contemplating the ruin of all enmities? How should I, in my insignificance, dare to stand between my friends and safety, a fitting company for that fair and gentle girl? How artificially false, too, was the position I had taken. Interweaving into my ideal life those coarse realities was the same sort of outrage as should one in some of the Venetian churches, where a lovely Madonna, the work of a great hand, may be seen bedizened and disfigured with paltry ornaments of the vilest sort. In this was I violating the whole poetry of my existence. These figures were as much out of keeping as would be a couple of Ostade's Boors in a grand Scripture piece by Domenichino.

"And yet, Potts," thought I, "they were really living creatures. They had the hearts for joy and sorrow and hope and the rest of it. They were pilgrims traveling the self-same road as you were. They were not illusions, but flesh and blood like you, that would suffer cold, and die of hunger if starved. Were they not then, as such, of more account than all your mere imaginings? would not the least of their daily mercies outweigh a whole bushel of fancied sorrow? and is it not a poor selfishness on your part, when you deem some airy conception of your brain of more account than that poor old man and that dark-eyed girl. Last of all, see they not, in all their rugged finery, more 'really true men' than you yourself, Potts, living in a maze of dreams? They only set when the saw-dust is raked and the lamps are lighted; not you are up, ever from dawn to dusk, and only lay down one motley to don another. Is not this wretched? Is it not ignoble? In all those changes of character how much of the real man will be left behind? Will there be one morsel of honest flesh when all the lacquer of paint is washed off? And was it—was it, Potts, when you first adventured out on the wide ocean of life?

I passed that evening and a great part of the night in such self-acensings, and then I addressed myself to action. I bethought me of my future and what and where and how it might be passed. The bag of money intrusted to me by the ministers to pay the charges of the road was hanging where I had placed it—on the mantle-shelf. I opened it and found a hundred and forty gold Napoleons, and some ten or twelve pounds in silver. I next set to count over my own capital hoard; it was a fraction under a thousand francs. Forty pounds was really a very small sum wherewith to confront a world to which I brought not any art, or trade, or means of livelihood; I say more, because I had not the slightest of a pretext for touching the other sum, and I resolved at once to hesitate in no way over. Now, what could be done with so humble a capital? I had heard of a great general who once pawned a watch sword—as well of honor as steel was—wherewith to buy a horse, and so mounted, he went forth over the Alps and conquered a kingdom. My story had no parallel for me, and somehow I did not feel as though I were the stuff that conquers kingdoms, and yet was much surely be a vain moment of men in life with about the same sort of faculties, merits, and demerits as I have, there must be at least another Potts family in every land, well-meaning, right-intentioned, worthless creatures, who, out of a supposed willingness to say thing, may end by doing nothing. Such people, it must be inferred, live upon what are called their wits, or, in other words, trade upon the daily accidents of life, and the use to which they can turn the traits of those they meet with.

I was resolved not to descend to this; no, I had determined to say adieu to all unessential bag, and to Potts, the disappointed man, one who had once dreamed of great ambitions, but had taken the wrong road to them. I would from this hour, be an honest, matter-of-speaking, simple-hearted creature. What the world might henceforth mean for me of its sympathy should be rendered on honest grounds; nay, more, in the spirit of those devotees who inspire themselves with piety by resolutions, I resolved on a course of self-mortification, I would not rest till I had made my former self expiate all the vainglorious wantonness of the past, and pay its severe penance for every transgression I had committed. I began forthwith my reformation. I sat down and wrote thus:

"To Mr. Dyer, Stephen's Green, Dublin,

"The gentleman who took away a dun pony from you [very sensible in the matter] is honest, and who, from certain circumstances, has not been able to restore the animal, sends herewith twenty pounds as his property. I, Mr. Dyer, conscientiously considers the sum insufficient, the sender will at some future time, he hopes, make good the difference."

Doubtless my esteemed reader will say, at this place, "The fellow couldn't do less; he need not vaunt himself on a commonplace act of honesty, either all, might have been said, suggested by certain fears of future consequences. His indiscretion amounted to horse-stealing, and horse-stealing is a felony."

All true, every word of it, most upright of judges; I say simply doing right ought, of a father what I ought long since to have done. But now, let me ask, is this, after all, the intrinsic course of life, and is there not more in doing what one ought when every temptation points to the other direction? and lastly, is it nothing to do what a man ought when the doing it costs exactly the half of all he has in the world?

Now, if I were, instead of being, the hero of a rain great writer that we all know and delight in, I would improve the occasion here by asking my reader, Can he always himself do such a thing? I would say to him, perhaps with all haste to anticipate his answer, Of course you do. You probably pinch your underlinen, lock your wife out of bed; you are a model father and a churchwarden; but I am only a poor apothecary's son, brought up in precept of thrift and the Dublin Pharmacopœia; and I owe to you, when I placed the half of my twenty-pound crisp clean bank-note inside of that letter, I felt I was figuratively cutting myself in two. But I did it like a man, I did it in the proper phrase for an act which I thought godlike. And now that my work is over and my sacrifice hasn't cost you a couch-load of regrets, and a shopful of hesitations about making it, it is of little worth. There's a wide difference between the gift of a sheep from an Australian farmer or the present of a child's pet lamb, even though the sheep be twice the size of the other.

I gave myself no small praise for what I had done, much figurative patting on the back, and a vast deal of that very ambiguous consolation which beggars in Catholic countries receive in change for alms by assurances that it will be remembered to you in Purgatory.

"Well," thought I, "the occasion isn't very far off, for my Purgatory begins to-morrow."

CHAPTER XXIX.

I was in a tourist locality, and easily provided myself with a light equipment for the road, resolved at once to take the foot-path in life and walk my fortune." I use those words simply as the expression of the utter uncertainty which prevailed as to whither I should go, and what to do when I got there.

If there be few more joyous things in life than to start off on foot with three or four choice companions, to make through some fine country, rich in scenery, varied in character and interesting in story, there are few more depressing than to set out by one's self, not very decided on what way to take, and with very little money to take.

One of the most grievous features of small means is, certainly, the almost exclusive occupation it gives the mind as to every, even the most trivial, incident that involves cost. Instead of dining at the table d'hôte and living, you fare away on many groschen and kreutzers. You are not drinking wine, your beverage is a solution of copper and sulphur! Even when you poke the fire every spark that flies up the chimney is a bodaco! You come at last to suspect that the sun were born but for nothing, and that the very breeze that cooled your brow is only retiring round the corner to ask "for something for himself."

When the rich man lives sparingly, the consolation is given him that he is saving for a child; he pleased sustains him. The poor fellow has no such consolation to fall back on; the closer his cost is examined the more wondrous will it appear. If it were simply that he dressed himself and fared coarsely, it might be borne with; but it is the hourly question that poverty is exposed to makes its true grievance. "An ill-looking" fellow, somebody somewhere expressed—" an ill-looking fellow had been seen about the premises at nightfall," says the police report. "A very suspicious character" had strolled for a bed; his wardrobe was a spotted handkerchief. The writer remembers that a fellow, much trained-and with great success-at the door that evening and asked if there was any "broken victuals" to be given away in the village." Heaven help the poor wayfarer if any one had been robbed, any house broken into, any rick set fire to, while he passed through that locality. There is no need of a crowd of witnesses to convict him, since every dingo in his hut, every tear in his coat, and every hole in his shoe are evidence against him.

I thought over these things in sorrow and humiliation, it was in a very proud spirit that I called to mind how, on that same morning, I deposited the bag with the ministers' messengers, Haben's bank, saw the contents duly counted over, replaced and sealed up, and then addressed to Sir Michael Quigley's dining-room attendants, taking a receipt for the same. "This was only common honesty," one reasoner will say. Well, there is an absurd collocation of words, it is that! Common honesty! why, there is nothing in this world so totally uncommon as honesty. Never, I beseech you, undervalue the waiter who restores the ring you dropped in the coffee-room, nor hail him cheerily as he picks back the umbrella you left in the cab. These seem such ordinary acts that they deserve no praise. Men are more or less Cornish wreckers in life, and very apt to regard the lost article as a treasure trove. I have said all this simply to show character, that you may know what it cost me, on that same morning, not to be a rogue, and not to cover myself with the pitiful attainder.

I underwent a very long and wearying self-examination as to ascertain if it was I had not appropriated that bag, an offense which, legally speaking, would only amount to a breach of trust. I asked myself, "Is it not as much mine as the money, Potts? Did you feel that your own means were ample enough? Was it that your philosophy had made you indifferent as to mere dross, and then think that the load was a burden?" Thus, taking higher ground, had you recalled the first twinkling of that honorable pursuit, that good man and careful apothecary, who had given you his boy and himself to your guidance, right and wrong?" I fear that I was obliged to say No, in turn, to each of these queries. I would have been very glad to be right, proud to have been a philosopher, overjoyed to feel myself swayed by moral motives, but I could not palm the imposition on my conscience, and I gave honestly by even that the real reason of my conduct was—I was in love! There was no other reason for it.

There was an old sultan once so impressed with an ill notion of the sex that whenever a lady was introduced to his presence he had, with over I read of some noble piece of heroism, or some daring act of self-devotion, I don't ask whether he got the Bath or the Victoria Cross, if he were made a governor here, or a vice-governor there, but when I read it my honesty by the glorious deed? I'd like to know all about her: the color of her eyes, her hair; was she slender or plump, was she fiery or phlegmatic, and in all attachment or an acute attack coming after a quarrel or first sight?

If I were the great chief of some great public department where all my subordinates were obliged to give heavy security for their honesty, I would neither ask for bailbonds or sureties; but I'd say, "Have you got a wife or a sweetheart? either will do, but one or the other. If she be worthy an honest man's love, I am satisfied; marry and swear to me, on your honor."

Oh, how I longed to stand aright in that dear girl's eyes, that else should see me worthy of her! Had she yielded to all my wayward notions and rambling opinions, giving way either in careless indolence or out of inability to dispute them, she had never made the deep impression on my heart. It was because she had bravely asserted her own independence, never conceding where principle was at issue, never yielding where unjustified, that I loved her. What a stupid reverie was that one in which when I fancied her one of those strong-minded, determined women—the stickyshod, umbrella-carrying female, who can travel alone and make her way through a convent-house! No, she was delicate, timid, and gentle; there was no over-confidence in her, nor the slightest presumption. Rain? not a bit of it. Guide, direct, support, confute, sustain me; elevate my sentiments, cheer me on my road to life, making all evil odious in my eyes, and the good to seem better!

I verily believe with such a woman, on humble condition in life offers more chances of happiness than a state of wealth and splendor. If the best prizes of life are to be picked up around a man's fireside, moderate means, conducing as they do to home joys, would point more certainly to these than all the splendor of grand receptions. If I were, say, a village doctor, a schoolmaster? I were able to do one substance in some occupation, whose pursuit might place, me sufficiently favorably in her eyes. I don't like curates, for instance, or even "dry goods," but something. It's no fault of mine if the English language be cramped and limited, and that I must employ the odious word "genteel," but it conveys, in a fashion, all that I mean.

I began to think how this was to be done. I might return to my own country, go back to Dublin, and become Potts and Son—at least and I. A very horrid thought, and very hard to adopt!

I might take a German degree in physic, and become an English doctor, say, at Bonn, Ems, Geneva, or some other resort of my countrymen on the Continent. I might give lectures, I marvellously well know on what, still less to whom; or I could start as Professor Potts, and instruct for eighteen a shilling. These were at least "three courses" open to me; and to consider them the better, I filled my pipe and strolled off on the high road into a shady copse of the beech-trees, at the foot of one of which, and close to a clear little rivulet, I threw myself at full length, and thus, like Tityrus, enjoyed the leafy shade, making my meerschaum do duty for the shepherd's reed.

I had not been long thus when I heard the footsteps of some persons on the road, and quickly after, the sound discontinuing, I judged that they must have crossed into the sward beneath which I stood. As I listened I detected voices, and the next moment two figures emerged from the cover and stood before me: they were Vaterlieu and Vintenfleck.

"Sit down," said I, pointing to each in turn to take a place at either side of me. They had, it is true, been the cause of the great calamity of my life, but in no sense was the fault theirs, and I wished to show that I was generous and open-minded. Vaterlieu acceded to my suggested invitation with a contrasted humility, and seated himself at a little distance; but Vintenfleck threw himself on the grass, and with such a careless "abandon," that her hair established from the hat that held it and fell in great wavy masses across my feet.

"Ay," thought I, as I looked at the graceful outlines of her finely-shaped figure, "here is the Amaryllis come to complete the tableau; only I wonder will fever spangles and a little more simplicity."

I saw that it was necessary to reassure Vaterlieu as to my perfect sanity by some explanation as to my strange mode of traveling, and told him briefly, "that it was a caprice common enough with my countrymen to assume the knapsack and take the road after a fever that had left it idle as to any more elevated career of life, and at least gained companionship with many from whom the accident of station might exclude us." I said the wish an artful delicacy, meant to imply that I was pointing at a very great and valuable privilege of pedestrianism.

He smiled with a sad, a very sad expression on his features, and said, "But in what wise, highly honored Sir"—he addressed me always as Hoch Ge-ehrter Herr—" could you promise to yourself advantage from such associations as these? I will not believe you would condescend to know us simply to carry away in memory the little traits that most needs distinguish such faces as ours. I would not insult my respect for you by supposing that you come among us to note the difference between our rude wretchedness and our mock gayety; and yet what else is there to gain? What can the poor mountebanks teach you beyond this?"

"Much," said I, with fervor, as I grasped his hand, and shook it heartily; "much, if you only give me the one lesson that I now listen to, and I learn that a man's heart can beat as truthfully under motley as under the embroidered coat of a minister. The man who speaks as you do can teach me much."

He put a wet hand over his hazy sigh and turned away his head. He arose after a few minutes, and, going quietly across the grass, spread his handkerchief on the bare head of the girl, by whom he at once fallen into a deep sleep.

"Poor child!" muttered he, "it is well she can sleep! She has eaten nothing to-day!"

"But, surely," said I, "there is some village or some wayside inn near this—"

"Yes, there is the Eckstein, a little public about two miles further; but we didn't care to reach it. Without a kreutzer! Ah, Herr! to pass many hours in a place and never call for any thing; even to be asked on, and answer, no; able from it; and as we have only what would pay for our supper and lodging, we thought we'd wear away the noon in the forest here, and arrive at the inn by close of day."

"Let me be your traveling companion for to-day," said I, "and let us push forward and have our dinner together. Yes, yes, there is far less of condescension in the offer than you suspect. I am neither rich nor miser. I am one of a class like your own, Vaterchen; and what I do for you to-day some one else will as probably do for me to-morrow."

Say what I would the old man would persist in believing that there was only another of those eccentricities for which Englishmen are famed; and though, with the tact of a native gooseberding, he showed no consistence in opposition, I saw plainly enough that he was unconvinced by all my arguments.

While the girl slept I asked him how he chanced upon the choice of his present mode of life, since there were many things in his tone and manner that struck me as strangely unlike what I should have ascribed to his order.

"It is a long story for short ears," said he; "five minutes will tell it, otherwise I might scruple to impose on your patience. It was thus I became—but you see me."

Short as the narrative was, I must keep it for another page.

REAL CHRISTMAS ANGELS.

I'm a very plain and homely man,
Just a feeble old or so,
And the chemicals troubles me, off and on,
Whether I will or no;
And so whenever that comes to pass
It drives me a most in a craze,
I think of the lots of time I lose—
The many working days.

For my old woman Meg, and I,
Agree on this, d'ye see,
That I shall be sick when she is well,
And I'm sure to be well when she's sick.
But then 'tis woeful hard to me,
When the winter nights are cold,
For I miss the shine of my old legs—
If the words be not too bold.

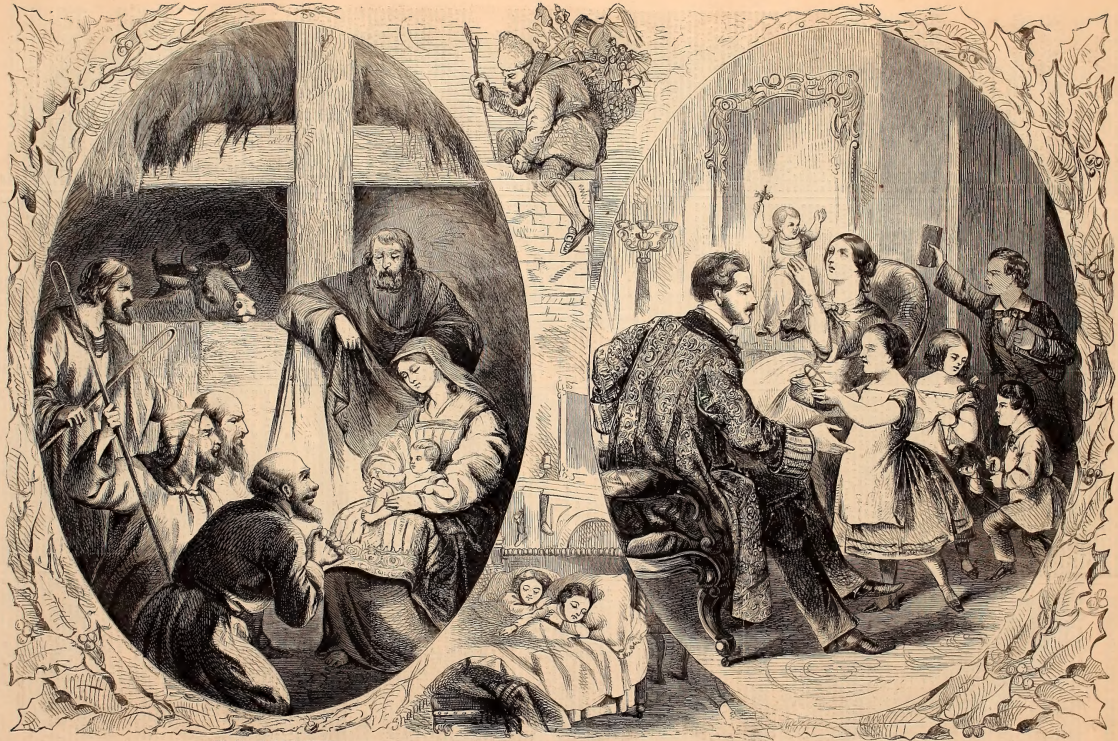
Yet Meg and I get somehow on,
For poverty isn't a crime,
And we never think nothing about it
Until it comes Christmas time.
For we have a memory, Meg and I,
Of a Christmas long ago,
When we both were strong and hearty,
And never knew want or woe.

And so it happens that Meg and I
Have been wishing a long time a-head,
And Meg and I, to keep life in,
Were obliged to go to bed.
But what it was in the shop,
And we hadn't a cent—not we;
So we thought it the hardest Christmas
We ever had chanced to see.

Meg sat in the bed a sewing,
I reading the Bible to her,
When there came at the door a tapping
Like a woodpecker tapping a tree.
Meg cried for the knock to enter,
And a rosy face peeped in,
With hazel eyes and clustering curls,
White teeth and a dimpled chin.

There was sunshine in a moment
To brush away the gloom,
And a voice like an angel's whisper
Went sweetly through the room.
It said, "Accept this turkey,
Some oysters and sweet oil, if you please;
It is Merry Christmas-Day,
And no one must starve or freeze."

Oh! wasn't Meg up directly,
But the angel had vanished in air,
And a roast goose stood on a bushel of coal,
And the turkey it lay on a chair.
And didn't we have a feast
In a good old-fashioned way;
And wasn't we warm and jollily fed
That glorious Christmas-Day!



So that is my tale all told—
A homely tale at the best—
At tale that Meg and I repeat
Each night when we go to rest.
I have heard of angels with wings,
Who noiselessly flit through the air,
But the angel of angels that we like best
Left a turkey upon the chair.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, December 10, in the Senate, after some routine business, Senator Summner presented a petition from Theodorus Hyatt, praying for relief for Kansas. Senator Pearce's resolution for a "Crisis Committee" was called up, and remarks were made by Senators Powell, Green, Jefferson, Foster, Douglas, Davis, Crittenden, King, Dixon, Brown, and Bayard. The Southern Senators generally were of the opinion that the Committee could do no good, though some of them agreed to vote for it. Senator Bayard, of New York, said that secession was rebellion, and rebellion would be put down by the bayonet. Senators Wade, Hawkins, of Florida, gave his reasons for refusing to serve on the Crisis Committee, which were, in a word, to let the proposed secession of his State. Mr. Vallandigham, of Ohio, and Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, protested against the election of Northern Democrats from the Committee. The former said he was willing to say this if it were necessary to cut off the West from the Ocean, they would cheerfully unite with the North and the Mississippi would run free. The latter declared that he could not attend the right of secession, and would not serve on the Committee for an hour of delay. Mr. Pearce's resolution was then agreed to. Interest. Some conversation ensued between Messrs. Sherman, Hemlen, Crawford, and Grow, on the Kansas question.

On Tuesday, December 11, in the Senate, the House bills authorizing the issue of new Treasury notes was made the order of the day for Thursday next. Mr. Pearce, of the Committee on Finance. A resolution was offered by Senator Bayard, of Delaware, that the Committee on Naval and Military affairs, be instructed to inquire whether the Secretary of the Navy being then taken up, was referred to

WHAT SANTA CLAUS BROUGHT US.

CHRISTMAS-DAY THEN AND NOW.

SANTA CLAUS
TOYS

"THE LAST STEP OF THE FORTY STEPS."

We were all sitting in a close cluster on the piazza that morning when the newsboy came up.

"Harper's Weekly, Sir; full o' pictures o' Newport, Sir," the little lads voice volunteered.

Miss Vaux put out her hand, with that one strange ring of equal and yet gratuitous coin, by which Carlisle intercepted the paper, and himself presented it to her. She takes things easily, quietly, sometimes even as she took this all these; dropping her brown head, smiling her red lips, and dropping out a careless-toned "Thank you."

He took it back from her to cut the pages, he quick glance running over the illustrations in the process. A knowing little smile over one his mouth once, and, taking out a lead-pencil, he wrote something rapidly on No. 4 of the "Sketches from Newport," and wrapping the paper again in its fair wife, that same smile and a low bend of his fine head. She received it with her former manner of careless grace: but the moment her eyes fell upon that pretty sketch, and the puzzling theorem, a dark red blush flashed her cheek over her clear skin, and between two quivering lines of scarlet two perfect rows of pearls clenched with some kind of emotion, and the round mouth was dilated with a hasty breath. There were hints and gentlenes in that group. Every one took their guise from her, and one adopted from his conversational tact, the most delicious bit of gossip.

We had all, one moment about the matter—that Wilverton Reese had been accepted by Miss Vaux on the last step of the "Forty Steps"; that Carlisle, himself, thought of both, was "confabbed," and had playfully written some sportive allusion on No. 4, as the pretty coincidence struck him. We all thought, too, the manner of Miss Vaux very sensitively overdone for so slight a thing, and were in a state of surprise—disappointed, more than the others, by the startled and even pained look upon his face. I was glad Wilverton Reese was not there, as he is curiously sensitive in his good-natured way, no knowing what blunder he might have made. Carlisle had done nothing ungentlemanly, for, for Carlisle's amusement was the finest towel of the whole group—kindly and considerate. Reasons we such an outline for Miss Vaux to demonstrate, too—Miss Vaux, whose cold white face had remained unmoved through every thing heretofore, whose self-possession had passed into a proverb with us. But before our gossip had been run through twice she had got it back again: and there was a little fierce blush in her hazel eyes—a gleam of scorn and anger, as if she hated her momentary weakness, and could think of nothing in comparison but some noble steel who had succumbed to fear for a second, and was giving pressure to an unshrinking submission to the lash from his master's hand; for so the stern soul of Salina Vaux was administering why and spur to herself. In this way she went calmly turning over the pages of the paper, making a running comment as she did so. Suddenly, she got over the first page, she uttered an exclamation—"How very sweet!"

"What is it?" some one asked. She held it to ward them, and we all looked at the cut—"PARTING, INTO TWO BANDS!"

"Oh, Miss Vaux, read the poem to us, please!" pleaded pretty little Miss Ayers. The rest seconded this request, and out of mere politeness for it was worth your while to hear Miss Vaux read when she would.

So she read the poem "AT NIGHT." Unless I want to feel as if I were bidding a last farewell to the dearest friend I have, with tears blinding my eyes and lips quivering over my heart, I never want to hear that poem again read by those thrilling tones. That little Rosalie Ayers actually came up to her room to cry it out; and that marvel of coolness, Parker Reveire, dropped his hat for an excuse to dash away the moisture that filled his vision. Carlisle's sensitive mouth was quivering; but he was so much more absorbed in observing the reader that he got from the cut, that his emotions were under control.

Her face was pale as death, and colder in its dead white symmetry than any thing human I had ever looked upon before. She had not the least sympathy with the tender, touching verses, though she read it in so electrical a manner; not from any want of feeling though, but from self-absorption. She realized it in part for as it gave her cause to express something of her mood. Women can understand time-pieces, women can, I believe, tell, but think she was at all aware of the state she had put us in; for presently she read out two or three little news items under her bright eyelashes, and her light remarks were thrown in, without the least apparent effort.

Because I have said Salina Vaux was always unmoved and self-possessed, and have spoken of her calm, I must not do not mean you are to suppose she was of the cold severe style, of the unmoving as well as unmoved; because, if you do, you will get altogether an erroneous notion of Salina. She she was what Tommy Ayers—Tommy Ayers, with his straw-colored mustache and extensive knowledge of human nature, calls "A bright girl—a decided bright girl, Sir!" That is, she was quick, and sparkling, an sportive in her manner, with a large amount of that quality called "tact;" as Tommy's sister Rosalie said, of Salina Vaux did things so nicely!" and then little Rosa added, "and with she was Salina Vaux, though Salina Vaux had a right to sing, and she had spoken to have often thought if Miss Vaux had been an heiress, like Rosalie Ayers, she would have swayed the world; but there is a law of dramatic unities, which is test, whatever we think we might do to better it. What now, would little Rosalie Ayers have been, even with her pink and white face, but for the thousands that made her faint, straw-colored hair golden? There are millions of girls like her, body and soul. But Salina Vaux, that cold, white lily, with a glitter of hoar-frost hanging about her, was out of all rule. Her father was an army officer, with enough private means to spend every cent of the interest, every summer, at Newport or Saratoga. As good as penniless, you know; but she had more thought bestowed upon her than any other girl—men and women hung round her fascinated, and the former sometimes left her for the "golden" haired Rosalie—and yet, I dare say, I guess she had been the heiress of Cauligton Ayers!

The thing would have been too unequal in the language of the irresistible Tommy, "She would have swept all the other girls into obscurity." And that is just what Salina Vaux did not want. wanted to make her Mrs. Tommy Ayers: Thomas Cauligton Ayers would be the heir of Thomas Cauligton Ayers's—because she didn't love him she wouldn't take him. Think of that! Put it down, that there are women left who have not such a low, grovelling care for what they shall eat, and what they shall drink, and what they shall wear, that they must barter all that is priceless and imprisinable for what is poor and perishable.

How came she by this all know? She didn't tell it, you may be sure; that wasn't her style. In the bitterness of his disappointment, one of her parents sent his friend to his bosom friend, and his bosom friend told Mrs. Grundy; and now she was engaged to Wilverton Reese, who was "younger, had more brains, more beauty, and better style—I doubt if he had any better heart than Tommy Ayers—he hadn't half as much money." I laugh, he handsed well, and even brilliantly, and evinced much thought and culture, I wondered whether, after all, he did not owe his success to his splendid person.

People may endeavore to underrate personal beauty as much as they please, I persons of imagination and sensibility it is more than they themselves are half the time aware: the influence especially of grace in movement is potent with them. I've seen Miss Vaux look up to watch Wilverton Reese cross a room, or perform any act of courtesy, with an interest and admiration quite new to her face.

There are some people who can understand this power of personal beauty, and Miss Vaux quite sure it is far more powerful than face beauty. This was Wilverton Reese's specialité—his perfect play of limb and motion. And was this what had carried Salina Vaux's heart? Let us see.

I said we had all but one thought about the matter of her strange engagement. We discussed with this idea, I went up to Lloyd Carlisle one wet morning to have library time, as he often did there, and asked him "why wasn't the engagement announced?"

"What engagement?"

"Miss Vaux's and—"

"Why, Miss Vaux and Wilverton Reese."

He turned a little for the sake of the rain, and held Mantell beside me.

"So you thought that too?"

"Yes, and you don't?"

"—new! What do you mean?"

I told him, and what I supposed he had written upon the word-sheet No. 4. And was this what he planation:

"About two weeks ago Miss Vaux and I went walking one evening, and came round to the Forty Steps at last. We had been silent for some time in our approach, and she answered a pause I found sitting cosily and quite sentimentally" (and he smiled humorously here) "on that 'last step.' It seemed to me that she was in a state of mind to cry over it as a matter of course. What I wrote upon the sketch was just this: 'Do you remember the last time you were there?' I meant by it simply such emotion I knew that I had been mistaken by her, and I thought she would have been glad to refer to her if I could have done it without involving other—for we knew the parties—or without compromising her still more. That was my explanation I should have drawn greater surprise down upon her and wider suggestions."

"Then Lloyd Carlisle, you haven't this beautiful of him! I'm good as told him so, whereat he did quite unconsciously, and looked up angrily.

"After that sudden evidence of feeling on her part," he went on, "something flashed over me. I felt a passion, I remember, which I was paralyzing alone down neat that very spot, quite absorbed in my own meditations, a vague moment or more ran through the web of my thoughts like an accompaniment; and when I got up and came away I was perfectly conscious that I was walking, for I was in the full moonlight. It was all so vague, and I so absorbed in my own reveries that I had forgotten it was Miss Vaux who was back the other morning while we sat there as the probable cause of her embarrassment; for she spoke in a shudder ought to have made new that Miss Vaux and Wilverton Reese. Do you see?"

"Yes, I do see, I think I see, even if it were them, why she should take it so seriously."

"I know it is very strange."

"Do you think she is in love with him, Mr. Carlisle—this Wilverton Reese?"

He waited a moment before he answered, looking out into the fine fog of rain as in a dream.

"I think she is pleased with him," making marked emphasis upon the word. "I think we are getting wet. Come in out of the rain, do." And we went into the parlor, finishing our conversation there. I was sorry I had written those new that so, and one I hicct; let the sequel develop it.

The day before when Miss Vaux, Wilverton Reese, Tommy Ayers and his sister, Parker Reveire, and the Ludlows, sisters, brothers, and cousins, to the tune of twenty, in the Tommy Ayers' phraseology.

"Oh, I'm so glad you've come! we are having such a delicious time talking people over!" And Cecil Ludlow, after delivering herself of this speech in a breathless gasp, made room for me on the little sofa she occupied.

"Doing people, and want us to assist at the operation!"

"Oh, Mr. Carlisle, that isn't like you! You never do the cynical and satirical."

"Am I so very amiable?"

"Oh, a perfect lamb, Mr. Carlisle!" returned Cad, showing her white teeth in a laugh.

"I had rather you had called me a deer!" he returned.

"Or a 'duck,' Carlisle," Reese suggested.

"Now don't, I toss that joke about my more, young gentlemen, but let us go back to our subject," Miss Ludlow interposed.

"Or to our sheep, in other words!"

"Mr. Reese, you'll be sent to Coventry presently if you start that vulgar joke; if there is any thing unanimable and of the persons we bring upon the carpet, it will not come from the lips of Miss Caroline Ludlow——Now, Cad, your cousin No. 8," Do I ever say malicious or unjust things of persons?"

"Oh no, of course not; you only relieve your mind!" answered the young gentleman, looking at her fondly over his eye-glasses.

She tossed her great ball of crochet wool at him and then with perfect smug frood said,

"We were speaking of Miss Wylde—Alice Wylde, who is the belle of the 57th, and whom Mr. Reeve admires immensely."

"Why does Mr. Reeve admire her immensely?" some one asked.

"Because she is colder than the northern seas, and dotted as a statue interpolated Caroline Ludlow's sassy tongue. Mr. Reeve was annoyed, so he was serious, and made answer,

"I admire Miss Wylde because she is delicately discreet: her coldness means dignity, that is all. She is so well balanced it's she would seldom or never be betrayed into doing inexplicable things that she regretted afterward."

Something more than a sneer than any thing I had ever seen on Lloyd Carlisle's face played round it now as he took up the subject, saying:

"I mean no reflection on Miss Wylde when I say that a woman who never does any thing she is sorry for is by no means a lovable character. Many of those best actions proceed from both the highest and the tenderest qualities of the nature, and the sudden reaction of regret is only the hard lesson of self-knowing its shadow!"

"Bravo!" cried the little Ludlow, clapping her hands softly, "how you demolish his sneeimages!"

"You misunderstand me, Carlisle," Reeve put in; "when I say there is nothing to regret afterward, I do not mean any light harmless speech or action, which the agency of an occasion always excuses; but I mean those little irregularities which Bell Romer, for instance, commits."

"Well, for instance?" rather impatiently suggested Carlisle.

"For instance, then—you know that story of Howe's blunder?"

"No, no!" exclaimed several voices.

"Well, she was leaning up against the cushions of a sofa in the corner of the public parlor, with three or four of her friends clustered round, as we are now. They were tired of dancing and talking, and they thought her asleep. Howe came in, and remarking it, with his usual suddenness bent over and kissed her on the cheek! Kissed him back again, being no more asleep than himself."

"Splendid!" cried Miss Ludlow, sinking back and clapping her hands—"Bell Romer forever! I'll go over and see her to-morrow."

"A visit unnecessary, Miss Ludlow: you must know the young lady had met him but three times then."

"Tout mieux: it isn't the length that gives the sweetness to the thing, you know, or how it is handsome enough to kiss, the ineffable fellow!"

"From that commenced a violent intimacy." Reeve went on—"a sort of Platonic affair, which gave them the privileges of carrying on prolonged tête-a-têtes, and of being ever found unnoticed by each other. Then when Howe got thrown from that wicked beast of his, nothing must do but she must go flirt with him, and be him every day, and half the time with only her little sister, May, for company—a servant's inquiries would have done quite as well—though her romantic impulse was, I believe, that he absolutely needed some womanly overlooking, and that a mother or sister could not give; so she established herself in that capacity. Now one would get the idea from this of a fast young lady—a romp, I suppose: we all know that Bell Romer is simply a warm-hearted, impulsive girl. If she had seen couldn't prefer such a girl as Alice Wylde for a wife after all?"

"I wouldn't," rang out Carlisle's resolute voice. "The Bell Romers are not to be taken from the very excess of innocence and girlish high spirits, draw down upon them the censure of the world simply because it is ignorant of their qualities, rightly directed or occupied, make them the most faithful companions, and the most delightful friends—for instance, or even its tenderness, where the emotions never betray the owner into the least irregularity, where the nature does any thing she does not is 'sorry for.' I do not mean to excuse, by any means, the irregularities of a certain class of young women whom we have slightly disseminated' fast' —properly; what we call 'irregularities' with them are insignificant. It is their rule to do wrong things. They go about it in a systematic, business manner, and are never so state as when they succeed in some piece of startling achievement. They have no regrets. It is greatly to be lamented that the impulsive actions of good, natural girls, like Bell Romer, should ever bear a likeness to the performances of these 'fast' young women. They should and do suffer for them; and I am sure that they do when they perceive the resemblance."

"But, Carlisle, what do you make of the careless lack of caution which leads a girl—or Miss Romer here—to accept a friendship which every one recognizes to be of the most sentimental order, but confessedly not a betrothal—to carry it on with notes and letters and rings and rose—all the paraphernalia of a love-affair?"

"I think, Reeve, that this is the most excusable of her shortcomings. When I see a relation of this kind, I know that it is with a prefect—that the woman's heart discerns that it is not complete enough to merge into marriage, yet yearning for a strength and sweetness of companionship which is her opposite, she accepts this half-relationship for a time, until she perceives that it will not do. It must be more or less at length, and it ends usually in being less. Then come the regrets; for the world's lessons come in, and she gets them over again, and strives to be loved their wisdom. From my soul I pity women! Their way is a narrow way, indeed, and hedged about with thorns. Let them remember this—that wealth, and the white face are bleeding. Yet all manner of temptations assail them, and assume the shape of angels' wings to them. Reeve, we have been shocked at clarity to all women: we, who have the most royal larges of liberty, are the worst ill."

As suddenly as he ceased speaking Miss Ludlow rose from her seat and went over to where he was standing, looking up in her electrical way, but without any blister or scene-making—" Lloyd Carlisle, you deserve to be knighted for your brave generosity and your brave declaration of them; and with her usual curious mixture of play and earnest, she unclasped her small chilion, and, flinging it over his shoulder, pinned it across his breast with a little gold cross which a moment ago glittered at her throat. "Sir Lloyd, Sir Cauligton Ayers, you are no longer Lloyd Carlisle, but a knight of the golden cross and Carlisle."

Carlisle was the most modest and retiring of men. He had gone out of himself in this burst of nobility—forgotten his personal identity; but, recalled again to it, he shrank, smiling and coloring, back into his shell of reserve. Miss Ludlow turned in a hurry from her fit of relief to all when she said, with perfect gravity,

"I wish you'd give me back our knight, Mr. Carlisle, I do not like to have persons it that Carlisle."

The tongues loosened after this, and we women, every one, began to utter our little opinions. Why cry one? No. Miss Vaux said never a word while we talked, but sent such a sudden, soft, and smiling look to Carlisle, that he, in his turn, rising, turned to go out at the door, but caught her foot in the easel and tazed of her morning robe, and reclosed with a bow that was perfect for Carlisle, who promptly swallowed unanimously with Wilverton Reese; but it was Carlisle who raised her, who gave her his arm out of the room. He did not come back to us; but out in the driving rain I saw him walk a few moments with her as she was in a dream.

This was Saturday. The next day, contrary to his usual custom, he came down at church bells ringing for the prayers, and looking disappointed, Miss Ludlow was standing at the window.

"Have do you think Carlisle's going to take you to church? You don't know the way alone!"

He laughed, colored a little, and answered, "Miss Vaux has been kind enough to offer me a seat to-day."

"Good! What's she going to do with the Prince of Wales?"

"Why?"

"Wilverton Reese. What's she going to do with him?"

Miss Vaux came down just then, clad in lilac—that mystical purity of color which few dare undertake; but which made me think of—

"Her face was like the blue,
And her heart as pure as they;
One of God's holy mysteries
Did walk with me that day."

for though not in the letter of the text was her dress like the lilies, yet in effect she looked as white and stainless as they.

Carlisle regarded her a moment with that peculiar expression of his, "as in a dream;" then coming forward joined her, receiving that soft, sad smile, and that bewildering question, "Did I keep you waiting?" said in the tones that read "EATHER, INTO TWO BANDS." Wilverton Reese was swinging his prayer-book by its tassel, and Miss Ludlow watching him inside; because Wilverton Reese had in a way established himself as Miss Vaux's escort to church heretofore, as he had established himself as escort upon most occasions; so his not going, and something else going, was rather out of rule.

Salina Vaux was impenetrable—just a lady—no less. As she recognized Mr. Reese she greeted him with her usual bell bend, and "Will you go to church with us?"

"No," he must write letters to-day" and so, simply, Miss Ludlow's question, of what she would do with the Prince of Wales was answered. The two went down the road up stairs to their pews in it may be, and Salina Vaux went into church with Lord Carlisle. That was a good thing of Miss Ludlow's.

Carlisle had heard, all his little time of knowing Salina Vaux, him as one who was cold; intellectual, accounting, but unimpassioned. He had his own thoughts, however; but to-day, when he sat beside her in the church, and more than his accustomed did he follow that low concentrated voice, the very voice that said "FATHER, INTO TWO BANDS," and the face, that cold white face, moved by the "Cross and Passion."

The tears had been thrilled through and through. It was after the supplication "O Lamb of God, who takest away the sins of the world!" that voice he had heard, and poured forth, almost in sobs, "Grant us thy peace!"

The bowed head and the slender profile, one quick look, and the tender sensibility, delicate as a woman's, that dwelt in Lloyd Carlisle's bosom, made him think of Mrs. Lazarus kneeling over her for the sight of them in hers. What was her "Cross and Passion?" from what sore need did she cry for "Peace?" If he had but any belief in the story of her want of warmth, any doubt of her intensity of nature, it swept away before this vision of her.

Going home they left the fashionable thoroughfare, and threaded their way down lane and road to their way.

There was something for Lloyd Carlisle to say—it was a good time now—and then and there he told her what his few words of pencilling had meant on the sketch No. 4.

The cold white face hung out its scarlet signal of distress a moment; another moment and she possessed herself again, calm and clear, saying with that imperturbable answer,

"I misunderstood you, and want to ask your pardon for treating you with coldness perhaps."

She let her gathered long eyelids before she asked. So, silently after this, they walked on, and at a turn of the road met Miss Romer—Bell Romer, who had been under stern admonition yesterday, and the handsome Howe in company. She had a hunt full of dogs, and one was just like a star in the dark blue of the gentleman's coat.

"There's No. 3 of the 'sketches,'" Carlisle remarked as they passed on.

"Preference? Yes, that is one of Mr. Revere's irregularities, and that is just like his Bell Romer, curious man you," Miss Vaux returned. Then she began—

"Oh! Mr. Carlisle, let me tell you how much I appreciated your kind sympathy for women yesterday, and how it did you the greatest honor."

"Thank you—you are kind to say so—but you overrate it, permit me to say. There are thousands of men who would express the same, I know; but you have not charmed to hear one before." he modestly deprecated.

She smiled such an ineffable smile—arch and unbelieving.

"No, I have not, Mr. Carlisle. I have met with many of your sex in my society, and I have talked with them—the finest of them, too—about my own sex; but somehow I never did chance to hear one of them express the sentiments that you did. You were a glorious chance to me, Mr. Carlisle. I feel her changed from that hour I must his pleased look. Suddenly, as she said this, a little rose flush clouded up her lovely throat to her cheeks, and she reclined, half-deadly, as if in apology for her warmth.

"One speaks to you as they do to their brothers, I believe, Mr. Carlisle!"

A certain veil seemed to spread over his face at this. He began something impetuously then stopped, and pulling down a spray of honey-suckle which peered over a stone wall, gave it to her with some common remark of admiration.

She absently put it in her belt; but directly meeting his eyes, a conscious blush arose to her face. Then, with charming courage, she said, blushing all the while,

"I might have done that if I had thought, Mr. Carlisle; but having done it, I have no desire to undo it."

What but Salina Vaux could have said that? Perhaps he thought this himself, for he remarked immediately—

"Miss Vaux, I think you could do any thing well, because you do every thing naturally."

They had not gone by this time a mile, going in, they found Miss Ludlow and Wilverton Reese sitting on the piazza.

Now you know look, Salina Vaux, and the thermometer at 90, and Lord Carlisle is like a cartation! Oh! where'd you get that honey-suckle? Carlisle picked it—stole it out of somebody's garden, hey? Fie, Carlisle, don't you know the commandments, and the supplement to the whole book—Lord have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law? And you put it in your belt, Salina—the honey-suckle, not the commandment, I mean. It is pretty there, very! Hoburn! Mr. Reese here has been entertaining me with beautiful Sunday tales about the neighbors—got upon Bell Romer again. We saw her go by, you know, you know with Howe, and how very her 'preference' paraded on his coat.' That is quoting Mr. Reese; and this young gentleman insists that she is only 'doing' Howe; that she is like the rest of her sweet sex—fond of power and fond of parading it, and will be just as sweet upon somebody when this wears out. What is this the matter with the Prince of Wales? What's the matter with you, Willy Reese? Who's somebody given you the mitten?" And Kate Caroline Ludlow, as her brothers called her, gave Mr. Reese a little sidelong look, as a cat watches a mouse.

The young man sat all the time tapping his boot with his cane, and wearing a smile which came uncalled for; you could do no less when Miss Ludlow had one.

For the rest, while Wilverton Reese was 'mad' after Rosalie Ayers—"paraded his preference" too openly, and bored himself to death; for every body knew he didn't care a pin for Rosalie Ayers—she wasn't his style at all. Every body guessed by these violent proceedings just what he intended they should—that he was piqued with Salina Vaux. Then, oh young men and maidens, do ye debut yourselves!

If Carlisle fancied there was a little shade of melancholy on Miss Vaux's face, it was not to her account entirely. There was another cordon gayety, but just her natural vivacity—a perfect sun—and a sweetness to Mr. Reese as to any body; while Mr. Reese, gentleman as he ought to have been by blood and breeding wasted her some. thing in pretending to sear in order to be kind, to tempt at careless indifference, that he never than ever brought down upon him what he came to escape, and defeat his designs.

There was a hop one evening at the ——. House. To use Miss Ludlow's curious but expressive word, "the Prince of Wales was particularly evil" this night; got furiously devoted to little Rosalie, and foolishly inattentive to Miss Vaux.

Provided Miss Vaux felt any thing—he was not nearly the actor that she was—through it all (and these things are the passage of fire to sensitive women) she lost not a breath of her ease, and there came a time of peculiar trial.

"You will dance with me the last time," and Parker Revere was holding her fan, and waiting eagerly for her answer, for he admired Miss Vaux "immensely."

"No, I can not, Mr. Revere; I have promised Mr. Reese the 'last.'"

"Happy Mr. Reese!" sighed the gentleman.

The dance came round, and Miss Vaux stood in a knot of acquaintances, waiting for the "happy Mr. Reese."

The horns, and harps, and viols took up their sweet winding involutions till the air was an atmosphere of subtle harmonies, and the floor was dotted with "dancers, dancing in tune;" and still Miss Vaux waited, and Lord Carlisle waiting with her—waited while the rest floated out into the mazes.

"Mr. Reese must have been taken suddenly ill, I think, Miss Vaux. I heard him telling Thornby that he did not feel well to-day."

"Oh, did he? I am sorry!" very pleasantly answered Miss Vaux to Mr. Carlisle's kind excuse; but just then happening to glance up into his face, she received that sudden, startled look which just then came into her eyes following his. What did she see that sent that dark-red flush to flame her cheek, and a blinding mist over her eyes? Wilverton Reese coming into his place her with Rosalie Ayers.

Carlisle must have felt how she was looking, for he never put his eyes upon her, and only said:

"There is some mistake. Now you will send me to my drop-to-sleep with this dance anyhow, if you will let me take advantage of it and favor me with your hand."

"No, Mr. Carlisle—that isn't best. If you will sit here by me, I shall like it better."

There was more confidence in this reply than she had ever given him before; it was dignified, too, and self-sustained. It said plainly, "I will be a lady, Mr. Reese forfeited his claim to a gentleman." She did not think that there was any misunderstanding.

Wilverton Reese was playing heavy stakes in his madness.

So they sat there, and Miss Vaux was not too proud for it. Mr. Carlisle saw the pain that was lining her face. You may be sure not a shade of this tacit treat escaped Lord Carlisle's eye. He was perhaps, he best himself with more than his usual kindness, with a certain fervor of manner, to her pleasure; just himself—Lord Carlisle—

"Over her head his arm he flung Across the velvet chair."

That was his purpose and his way. She must have been insensible if she had been regardless of it or indifferent. Miss Vaux was not. She understood, she dropped the world mask lower yet to him, and talked her sad soul out in some indirect expression of passion.

In this occupancy the wild waltz strains surging past and around them did away; the hum of voices took the place. Miss Vaux was not to dance.

As Wilverton Reese went dashing down the hall with a lady's harnesses on his arm, Carlisle's "mild and magnificent eye," blazing scorn and wrath, straight down upon him, and Wilverton Reese's face straight before them, where he attempted surprise, and recollection, and violent contrition all together. "Would Miss Vaux excuse him? his memory was more treacherous than gallant; he had forgotten that she had promised him the honor of her hand until he saw them there."

Carlisle's face was expressing all the contempt and scorn of which it was capable. Miss Vaux—the inimitable Miss Vaux—oh! Wilverton Reese, why did you pit your shadow of dissemblance against this sunlight? Miss Vaux, who smelled her proud lips into a smile, as arch and merry as if no pain had ever contracted them, and who, in a moment more, just tinctured with banter, gave this adroit little speech: "Don't tell Carl Ludlow [the brother] of your treachery, your memory has become—she would never cease teasing you! Come, you've been cross quite long enough, Master Wilverton; let us be friends, as children say, and I will show myself gracious by forgiving your last 'thrust.' What a little boy he is, Mr. Carlisle?"

Stunned into silence, young Reese stood, and out of it Salina Vaux went leaning on the arm of Lord Carlisle.

She had had her revenge—a good and righteous one—and he knew it. Miss Vaux, just incensed enough to appease his own vanity, saw his superficial structure of plans unmasked, and his trash. He must have seen felt comfortable, certainly.

Lloyd Carlisle was also stunned into silence at the unexpected turn of affairs.

In the entrance hall she raised the old sad face to him, and said, in pleading tones,

"Mr. Carlisle, you will excuse me an utter dissemblor for what you have seen. I am very wilful proud, and in Pride's merciless eyes I suffer and die sometimes: I have done what I could tonight—— And after a brief hesitation, and a little lower, a little trembling voice, "I am only a woman now you will lose what faith you may have in me by what you have seen; and I can not bear you to."

They were at her room door; what did he mean? Was he, actually, but with the tips of his fingers, dropping his lips to her hand, "God bless you, dear Miss Vaux?" What did he mean? That was all. The next moment she was in the solitude of her room.

Carl Ludlow stood waiting at the door the morning after the ball, and bounced that last waltz—waiting for some one, with her hat on, and swinging her parasol. Wilverton Reese came down the stairs, looking unapproachable. She knew him with a word or two.

"There's a mistake. Did you know about it, Mr. Reese?"

"What?"

"Why, our all supposing that it was you to whom Miss Vaux was engaged, when it is Lloyd Carlisle."

What possessed Miss Ludlow? She said once she hated handsome men, they grew to be so cruelly selfish. She hated Wilverton Reese—loved him, whom she longed to hate, and could not, so she made amends on the rest.

If it was her wish to torture a handsome man now, she had done it. Pride and some deeper emotion was visible in his face; and at this very moment a round of a shipper came in at each, then a rustle of a cambric gown, and Miss Vaux herself.

"Good-morning!" and the head went down in a Lanzer's dip to them.

He returned the salutation with a look of proud pain; the train fell; and saluted into a stern manly spirit. He had sinned against her openly—had pain repent, and shiver his sullied lance at her feet. Wonder! Wonder!

She bowed, and passed on down the piazza: he hesitated a moment, then followed her in his soft, supercilious way. "Miss Ludlow tells me that you are to be congratulated, Miss Vaux."

"How?"

"On your engagement with Mr. Carlisle."

She smiled a little wearily—" Miss Ludlow has been misinformed, I fear."

Mr. Reese waited for something else, but Salina Vaux rarely said more than enough. While he waited in expectation, there came into his face more than one strange ring of opal and jet.

He must have felt that he had been a serpent, then thrusting it out of his sight, instantly said,

"So our friendly relations are all over?"

"No, unless you wish it; that peculiar phase of it is over, of course."

"Why, Salina?"

There are certain looks, and words, and ways, which are so fragrant, as it were, of our first consciousness of passion, so inexorably connected with that first, sweet time of knowing them, that they have a dangerous power. So this "Why, Salina?" Mr. Reese forgot—but she went on in the manner she had marked out:

"Because you have so misunderstood my character that it is useless to further humiliation for me to continue in the same relation."

"Humiliation! Salina!"

"When you put that ring upon my finger as we stood at the 'Forty Steps,' that last evening we visited together, you understood that it was in seal of engagement, but of simple, tender friendship. I thought you understood too, how, though declining to wear your betrothal, that I was obtained for you a warm and tender regard; that I liked you even better than any lady I knew; that it was from no coquetry, no fear of losing misadventure, that I refused, led me to reject any closer ties; but because I felt that I could not be your wife, I felt that then, at least, the feeling was not entire and complete enough to sanction it; and I would not promise what I knew could not be fulfill. You remember what followed. As you held my hand as putting that ring upon my finger we saw Mr. Carlisle near the path, in the early moonlight. The impulse that led me to draw my hand away was only the natural impulse to fear of being misunderstood by him. You put a different construction upon it, and held me fast. I was pained, not so much at the mistake or misconception by another, and even the consequent peril to my proud delicacy, but at the selfishness that led you to place me in such a position. I forgave you, however; but when we met again, your manner of shy coldness towards a lady was the possible love for you, I felt it real your thought—after all my evidence of regard for you, you still doubted; believed I was playing with you. This was not an attempt to quette. In it I read, too, further proof of selfishness. You forgot that I had something to forgive, that you had to ask for its equivocal pardon, and more than ever owed me all tender courtesy after that. What should you have done? You have let me, to have lost sight of this in your pique and passion? Oh, Wilverton! she went on, in a little burst of regret, "I never that such a friendship as we essayed was wild and impracticable, as Mr. Carlisle told us that day in the drawing-room—that it was a farce for us both that it is dead; but I grieve at the manner of its death. My father has said well, that of a long train of proud women I was the proudest. But I am not too proud to tell you that you have made me suffer much for that pride. Pride and self-love assisted at an accident with ashes; for you had put a great humiliation upon the first, and disappointed me utterly in the last."

"You may have forgotten," he interrupted, "that you had promised me the preference to Mr. Carlisle for these last weeks, to the exclusion of all others."

"Mr. Carlisle was specially kind to me. I have not sought him out to bestow favor. When another failed me, I found myself surrounded by that kind presence, and accepted it thankfully."

Voices and footsteps rang down the colonnade, and the gentlemen came over. They remained long together, talked of common familiar things, walking side by side the length of the promenade and down the hall, and left her at the door of her own room, bowing low, with that matchless grace, to her bending head. The great world rushing by now only the accompaniment of eternity; it was the sign of renunciation and death, with a little flag of the world's trace fluttering down the wind.

Sitting afar off there had been an observer but not a hearer of the last act of this sad drama. Under the brim of the straw-hat Lloyd Carlisle's kind, gray eyes were beaming. As Miss Vaux disappeared, with a little emotive drop of her indoor height, he murmured, "as in a dream," "God bless her!"

The great crowd rushed on—and presently September came. The crowd begins to thin. Later yet, the middle of the month, and the plantation time of all the season, is here. Little knots of public cluster together, parties of friends sit down by morning fires in the cool autumn days, and take their drives without the blinding foam of dust for company. So the little circle of which Miss Vaux was the centre sat by their morning fires, and walked or drove together, into the last. And the last came down in October—lovely days of rain, snow, and gold, and purple, with the white mists of that tender climate spreading its canvas over all.

Miss Vaux stood in profound reverie, leaning her head against the marble fire-place, looking into the fire—the earliest one, and the only one, in the small private parlor. Next, Mr. Carlisle came down, and they talked of the season and its close, standing there together.

"Miss Vaux, Miss Vaux; I want to ask something of you."

She looked up.

"That you will walk with me the last day that we are here?"

"Certainly."

And here Miss Ludlow, shivering under her scarlet shawl, came in, and alighted in a mass of splendid autumn leaves down before the full blaze of the sea coal, and sent out her own fiery sparkles of talk and tint.

Catching the gentleman's gaze, she said,

"We are a pretty contrast—aren't we, Howe and the Ludlow? I think I shall 'call myself' names; but Salina always suggests those rare white lilies, dotted, pard-like, in purple near their hearts. I found out their self-sustained life the other day—Lancelotian! Isn't it pretty?" And she looked at Salina, at the time.

Miss Vaux lifted her arm, and broke out a perfect crimson dahlia from the bouquet that adorned the mantle, and dropped it softly down upon the splendid Ludlow, saying,

"This is a dachess, you know, and belongs to you: so I pin it on with the compliment." And with the solemn in her bosom, the duchess led the way to breakfast.

It was the last day; in the morning they would part from the scene of their summer solstice.

Carlisle was drawing on his gloves, looking grave, almost sad you would have said, as he waited for Miss Vaux. She came down the colonnade clad in her natural color—blue; but warmed up by a bright shawl, and with a bunch of scarlet verbenas hanging on her bosom. They turned off toward the bath house, as soon as prayers, and met Miss Ludlow and Mr. Reese sauntering home. Miss Ludlow had on one of those scarlet shawls in her hand—Lancelotian. She stopped, and insisted upon its having a place with the verbenas, and here and fastened it on to Salina's beautiful bosom-ornament.

"I got it for you—the only one in Thorn's country," she said, as she left her hand.

Talking, or lost in their own thoughts, Carlisle and Miss Vaux found themselves just above the "Forty Steps." A little color came into her face; a little start betrayed her mind. The gentleman remembered too his blunder, and for a moment was disturbed; but Miss Vaux restored him the ease by a strange proposition, perhaps, but like her sincere courage:

"Let us sit down here." He turned quietly.

"Will you sit upon the last step with me, Miss Vaux? It is the moment to remember it now?" He helped her down, "as in a dream." What was his dream? Hear. "I have neither wealth, nor beauty, nor any great position to offer you. I am but a simple-mannered gentleman, with only a comfortable fortune; but I love you. Perhaps you will seek foreign love? And thus he told his dream on that prophetic spot, and it proved more than mere dream to her.

For the first time she knew that the first complete love of her life had come; so insidious and swift had been its approaches that she did not know the modest, tender guest, until "unto this last."

And he told him this the full and complete story of "The Forty Steps," of that half relationship with which she had striven to ease her heart.

"As one standing and moved now," she replied, "was her defense in the drawing-room that day touched and softened me." She took the white lily softly from his bosom, and kissed into its heart-frosted centre.

"I am not like this now, Mr. Carlisle; the world has touched me; but such as it is—" He took the lily of the land.

"Hush, dear, you are finer than this. 'The hoar-frost rosy-red' heart has melted away."

The soft gray day, the rhythmic roar of the surf, like a great celestial chant, the bowed head, and the low-lipped speech, made it all like a certain Sabbath morn. Half-unconsciously, he said, "as in a dream," "O Lamb of God, who takest away the sins of the world!" "Amen as thy peace!" she answered, and, turning a radiant face to him, added "Are you ready to go?" And so on that Sabbath morn, home, through green lanes and hypaths, they took their way. He had the lily in his hand, and the natural lingers of the day; and as he had always worn before, a curious ring of braided gold, and a diamond.

Miss Ludlow was pacing the piazza as they came up.

Her eye caught the flower, and, cut the soft sparkle of the dewy grass.

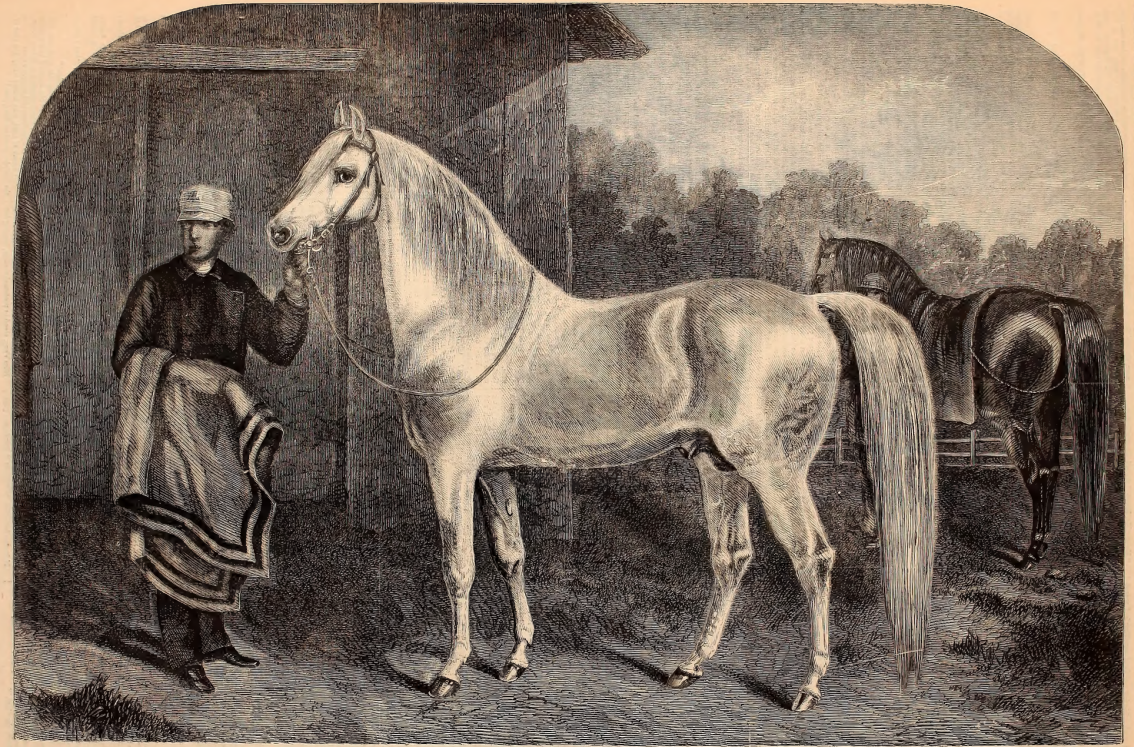
Hard, and worldly, and wayward as she seemed, there was a tender spot in her heart—and she loved Miss Vaux. Her face, with its quick penetration, she appreciated and approved Mr. Carlisle.

The lily and the ring—she had the whole story, and, going straight up to Miss Vaux, for the first time in their acquaintance, beat her lips to hers, and kissed her forehead, or, you know, cheek, smiling, as she gave her hand to Mr. Carlisle; but the next moment exclaimed,

"Why, how you have been doing to the Lancelotians? All that pretty glitter like hoar-frost has melted away!"

Sure enough, and into the heart a rosy stain was flushing, as if the pard-like spots of purple had passed their blood there.

"Isn't it strange?" Miss Ludlow pondered aloud; it must be the warmth of your kisses, Kate."



Lloyd Carlisle looked, with a certain tender gravity, into the dear hazel eyes that were raised earnestly to his.

"Isn't it strange?" she went on; "but I like it better so."

"I like it better so, Miss Ludlow."

And Miss Ludlow, following his eyes, saw the scarlet rose tint that flushed the lover's heart steadily—saw the cold, white coloring of Salina Vaux. The glitter of hoar-frost had melted away.

"Lamb of God, who takest away the sins of the world—grant us thy peace!"

THE BATTLE OF THE STORE.

I was poring over my ledger
On a cold November day,
And counting up my profits
In a calculating way.
How I strove, and worried, and dreamed,
And dreamed, and talked, and swore,
As I fought the fight through many a year—
The battle of the store.

I was thinking it over and over—
The per cent. I should lose on Brown,
And whether I'd sell to Smith again
Whenever he came to town;
And whether my thought on Jones
Would trouble me any more,
And so I went fighting, fighting on,
The battle of the store.

I was poring over my ledger
On a cold November day,
When I heard a voice at my elbow,
In a supplicating way:
"Will you let me entreat your notice
Toward this little book?
The price is only a shilling;
I think you will buy if you look."

I turned my head to my shoulder,
To a figure gaunt and grey,
Whose coat was shabby, and very thin
For this cold November day.
He had every look about him
Of a room in a dirty street,
With a smoky fire in it,
And never enough to eat.

He stood at my elbow humbly,
And stared a vacant stare,
While I took his book with a business smile,
And motioned him to a chair.
For somehow in the ledger
I had entered that old man gray,
And I knew I should find the entry
At no far distant day.

I would give him a touch of nature,
Forgetting the god I obeyed;
So I gave the fire a goodly stir,
And I asked him, "How is trade?"
"Ah! trade is very, very low,
And bread and meat are high;
And the weather is very, very cold—
And do you not with you could die?"

I said that I thought I was willing to live
And struggle on for a while;
So the old man said it was very well,
And smiled a ghostly smile.
"But when you have lived as I have lived,
And lost as I have lost,
You will wish for death as the only rest
That is left for the tempest-tossed.

"It was many and many a year ago,
I could look in my ledger and see
The names of my debtors in every land,
And my ships on every sea.
I sat and counted the loss and gain
As 'tis counted to-day by you,
And I looked on my God and my love of truth
In a business point of view.

"I have seen my dream of gold dispelled,
My friends among the dead,
And the name that sized for a million once
Not good for a loaf of bread.
I have lived to see far more than this—
My wife and my children fair
Go one by one to the silent land—
They tarry for me there."

He ceased, and wiped the dropping tears
From off his withered face,
Then slowly from his pocket took
A strip of ragged lace.
He kissed and pressed it to his lips,
And speaking thick and fast—
"This is the only relic left
That binds me with the past."

Oh! and and desolate old man—
Thou type of all thy race—
Like thee, they cling unto the past
By bits of ragged lace.
Like thee, they pace the dreary round
Of pleasure or of pain;
Like thee, they dwell upon a life
They would not live again.

Good-night, thou man of many woes!
Come not again to me,
For I have debts in every land,
And ships on every sea.
And I have wife and children fair;
My friends are not yet dead;
But still I'll close my ledger up,
And think on what you've said.

OUR HORSE-SHOW. THE ARAB HORSE.

We continue our series of pictures of American horses, cattle, sheep, and other animals with the Arab horse "Calif" of Cairo, whose portrait will be found on page 812. The Arabian's superior qualifications of beauty and temper place him at the head of our horses, and to him originally, with very few exceptions, we trace almost every breed of horses in the United States.

We have now an innumerable list of horses of assumed variety of breed, comprising Black Hawks, Messengers, Abdallahs, Membrinos, Almacks, Eclipse, Bellfounders, Morgans, and Andrew Jacksons, all of whom are claimed to be the patriarchal breeds of American horses; but by careful investigation of their pedigrees we shall invariably find the name of "Bashaw," distinguishing at once the Arab blood to which they are indebted for their surpassing speed and beauty.

The subject of our present illustration, the beautiful "Calif," of Cairo, was presented, when a foal, to the United States Consul for Egypt by Abbas Pasha, as the best specimen of the Arabian horse to be found in that country. He is a beautiful silver-gray, with silky mane and tail, legs and feet of remarkable delicacy of outline, and a head and eye that stamps the Arabian blood.

He is about fifteen hands high, kind as a dove, and immensely strong; but, as is usual with Arabs, has never evinced much speed as a trotter. Upon this ground alone do some of our horsemen refer to the breed; and in those districts the Arabian is decidedly unpopular. A slight investigation of the pedigree of all our best horses will show how unfounded is this prejudice.

Calif is at present in Philadelphia, at the stable of his owner, Lieut. Gen. Scott, in the city. Our drawing is from life, representing him as he appeared at the Eclipse Fair, Centreville Course, Long Island.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

The Teeth.

Here for people consider the importance of preserving their teeth! and how many would give thousands of dollars could they regain them after the loss has become irreparable.

The mouth should always be thoroughly cleansed before going to bed, and after each meal, especially after eating or drinking what is acid or sour, as the acid is of chief, in connection with the secretions of the mouth, set upon, and in time destroy the enamel of the teeth.

Burnett's Oriental Tooth Wash, Prepared by Messrs. Joseph Burnett & Co., Boston, is not only a powerful detergent and cleanser of the teeth, but by its vegetable astringent properties, acts directly upon the caries, thereby most effectively arresting decay, and forming a protective and almost impervious coating in the cavity, even where the nerve is exposed. Its action is also most beneficial upon the gums, keeping them firmly attached to the teeth, and preventing the bleeding of the gums, which is very often common. The Oriental Tooth Wash is moreover one of the pleasantest remedies in the world; combining pungent, and aromatic, it imparts to the breath a peculiarly clean and delightful fragrance.

We advise our readers to try it.

THE
New York Mercury
For the New Year.

In accordance with a time-honored custom, the publication of the NEW YORK MERCURY, the largest two-dollar literary weekly in the world, make the opening of a New Year the occasion for issuing a comprehensive prospectus of its future policy.

Although the patriarch of the weekly press (being now in its twenty-fifth year), THE MERCURY teems with the fire and vigor of youth, as well as with the wisdom and dignity of mature years. Disarming, as it does, the crying ills of crime of literature, enriched with the entrancing mysteries of the most powerful romances in the world—glittering with the brilliant wit and humor of the sharpest pens of the time—abundantly garnished with the rarest gems of native poesy—overflowing with "thoughts that breathe and words that burn" from the great writers of the immense contributorial staff, and honored all over the country for its perfect freedom from anything calculated to wound or repulse the most sensitive moralist or clear of principle—it has been for years the LUXURY, THE FEARLESS, THE MONITOR, AND THE WELCOME GUEST OF HUNDREDS OF THOUSANDS OF FAMILIES AND FIRESIDES.

The publishers and proprietors of THE NEW YORK MERCURY have made the following announcement:

"Here shall young Genius wing his eagle flight, Rich dew-drops shining from the plumes of light."

and during the present year (1861) its grand, inimitable staff of writers—whose unrivaled salaries exceed the total of those paid to the President and Vice-President of the United States—will in brilliant consideration of literary specialities will be materially extended. Thus, one of the specialties now engaging the pens is that of the witty, waggish, quizzical, whimsical, world-renowned, and pungent who contributes to THE MERCURY a side-splitting series of Burlesque Biographies, Humorous Sermons, Fashion Articles, Criticisms of Paintings, Plays, Statues, etc., under the general and significant title of "DIVERSIONS OF DOESTICKS," or, HARLEQUIN HITS AT THE TIMES."

Q. K. PHILANDER DOESTICKS, P. D.,

In the Fictorial Department, appear the magnificent illustrations of that prince of American artists, FELIX O. C. DARLEY.

The Publishers of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE have made engagements which they are confident will render the Twenty-Second Volume, of which this is the second Number, more valuable and attractive than any which have preceded it.

The Article on "Washoe" in this Number is the second of a Series of Papers portraying Life and Character in California and Nevada. Mr. ROSS BROWNE is the Confidential Government Agent for the Pacific States. They will be profusely illustrated with Drawings by SPENCER, MCLENAN, CLEVER, and others, from the Character Sketches by the Author.

In the February Number will appear the first part of a New Story by W. M. THACKERAY, which, it is expected, will be continued in successive Numbers during the year.

Other Illustrated Papers, depicting Life, Character, and Scenery in every part of the American Continent, from Labrador to Florida, are in course of preparation by favorite American Writers.

The Publishers trust that the thousands of Voluntary Correspondents by whom all the Editors have been able to make the "Drawer" a marked feature of the Magazine, will continue their favors; and that new Correspondents will forward such anecdotes and facetiæ as come under their observation.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. IV.—No. 209.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CHRISTMAS-DAY, 1860.

The Christmas Gift.

THE Christmas morn is bright and clear,
And through the frosty atmosphere
Heaven seems more than ever near.

And silver-sounding through the air,
The chimes are thrilling, here and there,
Sweet music melting into prayer.

Through the broad streets a motley throng
Of joyous faces sweeps along,
With smiles that touch the heart like song.

For ne'er from voice or instrument
Was ever richer music sent
Than the sweet smile of calm content.

And over all the city flows,
As dew descends upon the rose,
A silent joy, a sweet repose.

So fair the day, so fair the show,
It rends one's very soul to know
That any heart is wrung with woe.

Yet in a quiet room I see
A pale-faced widow bend the knee,
And pray to Heaven silently.

And tears are coursing down her cheek:
Her lips, though quivering, can not speak—
When the heart prays the tongue is weak.

In virtue of the poet's gift,
The veil from off her soul I lift,
And watch the thoughts that heavenward drift.

And all those earnest prayers, I know,
Are for the boy that long ago
Left her to sadness and to woe.

And though he be—she knows not where—
She tracks him with her mother's prayer,
And wastes her days 'twixt hope and care.

But while her sweet petitions soar,
There comes a ringing at the door,
A cheery step upon the floor,

And a hale man with rosy face,
That makes a brightness in the place,
Comes briskly in with active pace.

Thus the new-comer gayly cries:
"What, sister, weeping? Dry those eyes:
Christmas was never made for sighs."

"A merry Christmas, brother dear!"
The widow says, and dries the tear.
"What brings you thus so early here?"

"Oh! nothing; only that, you know,
Since we were children long ago,
And tumbled in the Christmas snow,

"Each Christmas-day I've given to you
Some little present, to renew
The love that long has linked us two.

"This year the thing escaped my mind;
You must not think me grown unkind,
Or that my love in aught's declined.

"But I have just dropped in to say,
That though my gift's postponed a day,
To-morrow forfeit I will pay.

"Come, tell me what you most desire—
An opal with its soul of fire,
Or chain of Malta's tenuous wire?

"Or do you love the amethyst,
That seems by purple sunsets kissed,
And faintly wreathed in evening mist?"

A faint smile plays across her face,
And lights it with a sorrowing grace,
Like moonlight on a lonely place.

"Ah, brother!" softly she replies,
While tears brim o'er her patient eyes,
"There is but one gem that I prize.

"Could you but give my boy to me,
I'd forfeit all the gems that be
In far Brazil or India's sea."

"Open the door!" the brother cries,
With pleasure leaping from his eyes;
"Here is my gift—and here your prize!"

The chamber-doors are flung apart—
With one loud sob, and one quick dart,
The prodigal lies on her heart!

Far sweeter than the chiming bells
That sound o'er towns and country dells
Is the joy that up from that chamber wells.

WHAT THEY SAY IN EUROPE.

WHEN the recent political and financial crisis burst upon us a few weeks since, the first thought of many people was—What will they say in Europe? It was generally supposed that the news of the proximate dissolution of the Union would excite the delight of the despots of Europe, and of all who are opposed to democratic government; it was universally understood that a financial revulsion of the most terrible character would follow the announcement of the fall in foreign exchange here, and of the general stagnation in business.

Well, they have got the news in Europe. And we are bound to say that, thus far, neither of the above expectations has been realized. No expression of delight has been uttered by any European despot or aristocrat. On the contrary, the voice of England has been eloquently and loudly raised for the preservation of the Union; and France has, it is said, declared that, in the event of the dissolution of the Union, it will support the Southern Confederacy. Letters from Germany intimate that the German powers will pronounce for the Union also.

Not only this, but there is no financial trouble abroad, and no prospect of any. Europe is sending us a couple of millions of gold per week, and doing it cheerfully. Indeed, while the unnatural operation of shipping specie from Europe to America must involve a decline in the price of all our staples—cotton, breadstuffs, tobacco, rice, provisions, etc.—of which she is the principal consumer. So far from being frightened at what has happened, Europe laughs at us for our fright. So far from sending our stocks back for redemption, England buys more at the decline.

It is true that at our latest dates from Europe the full danger of disunion was not realized. It was not generally believed that the Cotton States were sincere in their purposes, and it was not suspected that the border States were willing to co-operate with them. The Message of the President had not been received, nor was it known that South Carolina would not as early as she has done. Perhaps when the Europeans receive these additional items of information they will take a more gloomy view of the future. But it is certain that, at present, they are neither alarmed for their commercial nor exultant about their political interests.

THE LOUNGER.

ABUSED WORDS.

A FEW weeks since the Lounger implored a little charity for a few words, of the most ordinary kind indeed, but which are latterly treated with extraordinary indignity. The word "begin" is one of them—a word which has done faithful service in the language from the beginning, but which is now discarded for "commence"—a good word, doubtless, but which shows no such very obvious superiority to the other that it should be constantly substituted for it.

Just at this moment, in the high and solemn debate which is going on in the country, the word "rupture" is most cavalierly supplanted by the clumsy term "disruption." The word "rupture" is derived from the Latin rumpo, to break; and it means the act of breaking and the state of being violently parted. No greater force than this has "disruption?" The prefix "dis" implies separation, as in "dismion;" but in a word which of itself has the same force it is superfluous, and therefore weakening.

So long as we talk, and write letters, and make speeches, let all be done decently, and in good grammar.

There is another word in which this State is interested, and which has recently changed itself, and begs the whole universe to take notice of the change. Our westernmost county, Chatauqua, has altered its final vowel. It was spelled formerly qua; it is now spelled que. The reason is obvious. The word qua is exactly what was tired of being called Chatarki, and it has so arranged it that it is now sure to get its final vowel.

So please don't abuse it by spelling it que, and calling tasque tarki. All the courts, and officers, and newspapers of the county have given in their adhesion to the new spelling. The oldest band has its notes engraved Chatauque; and all legal papers adopt the same form. It seems to have been a unanimous but peaceful revolution. "Disruption" is another affair.

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE WINDOW QUESTION.

DEAR LOUNGER,—In a recent number I saw that you had a great deal to say about the discomfort of close cars, and of somebody's futile efforts to have the windows opened on a moist evening. Suppose you are a pretty fair fellow, and I should like to have a reasonable word with you.

You know well that I and that if a window is opened in a car, it works badly for the person who sits behind, for he gets the full blast in his face, while the man in front gets only a pleasant coolness. How do you know that it may not be very distasteful to your neighbor? How do you know that he may not be very much uncomfortable? Yes, and how do you know that he may not have a cold or some illness which might be increased by the steady gush of sharp, chill, wintry air?

Do you say that, in such a case, the man would have spoken and told you so? Why, no, not necessarily. In the very article of which I began by speaking, you say that you are not sure that you should practice what you preach, and so you may be very sure that the same feeling which would prevent you from speaking upon having the window open would prevent many a man from insisting upon having it closed. I knew a man who was rowing in a big boat with a friend who knew nothing about rowing and pulled directly against the other. But the other said nothing, and merely put out another oar, to keep the boat moving properly.

Now would you say that the fresh air can't hurt any body, and that your neighbor ought to like it, and that science shows how human life is shortened and the human system poisoned by foul air? Will you quote Florence Nightingale, who considers fresh air a panacea? Certainly you may say so, and believe it; and Miss Nightingale may be right; but who made you the judge in your neighbor's case? Suppose he says, "Dum your fresh air, I've got a sore throat or a thin coat, and it makes me hoarse or makes me chilly. I don't care for your science. I'm not dear lady, Miss Nightingale, except to admire her bravery and devotion; I want to be comfortable, and I'll take the risk of getting a pleurisy, shut the window." What will you do, dear Lounger? Isn't it just as selfish in you to keep the window open when he actually wants it shut, as it would be in him if he sat in your place to insist upon keeping it shut when you wanted it open? It may have come to a contest of generosity between you; but I am inclined to think that you would shut the window and conquer.

That is just the difficulty in the matter of travel in cars. There is nothing with the window shut that does not implicate the comfort of other people, and you ought to consider that quite as much as your own. It is a question of something more. There is no doubt that as our cars are arranged the violent draught of air, although it may be fresh may be also wholly unhealthy. If you could have fresh air merely, nobody would object; but when you must have it in a way which is also injurious, then you must strike a balance of evils between the hot air and the cold. I remember traveling once by night upon the Erie road—and there, if any where, you have the pure poison of foul air. The atmosphere of the car when I opened the door at midnight to step on was overpowering. There was something deadly and appalling in the miasma which poured out as I entered. As I sat down I opened a window, as instinctively as you would snatch a board if you were drowning, and I plunged my head out into the starry coldness of the night. I had scarcely done so when a hand was laid upon my shoulder from behind. "Please, Sir," said a plaintive voice, "my wife is very ill, and the sharp air pains her." Closing the window, I turned and saw a sickly woman sitting upon the next seat with a pale invalid face lying upon his shoulder. They were poor emigrants going West.

The true remedy for the difficulty would be a system of ventilation which should allow the escape of the foul air without exposing any body to the cutting draught. That will come with the Millennium. It will come when public halls are properly ventilated, when public streets are properly swept, and when public common-sense suggests that public health and morality are closely allied to public prosperity.

Meanwhile let us get as much fresh air as we can, dear Lounger, but when we are pinched, let us remember that it is not altogether because other people want to breathe foul air.

Yours fraternally,
BOREHAM.

THE VERGE OF THE PIT.

MY name is Chirrup (or something very like it), and until very lately I was a fashionable man in the Detective department of Her Majesty's Police Establishment. I am considerably below the age at which police officials are entitled to retire on half-pay; but having received an awkward stab in the neck, while capturing a renowned thief, the injury was allowed to reckon time, and retired I am.

During my thirteen years of active service I earned for myself a fair reputation for skill and cunning as a snarer of jail-birds. I have vanity enough to believe that I deserve it. I could count on my fingers the number of times I have strayed from the rigid path of duty. Yet I have the satisfaction of deriving more comfort from the commission of at least one of the said slips, than from any dozen of my most brilliant achievements.

I am remarkable for it by a letter I have just received. It bears the Canadian post-mark, and is fraught with pleasant news. The writer tells me he is prosperous and happy. He alludes to me as his "dear friend" and "preserver." Why he should write to me, I don't comprehend with me at all—involves rather a singular story.

One night, at the end of November, 1849, I was returning from a business jaunt. It was a bitter night. It was too late for omnibuses, not a cab was to be seen; so, from Hammersmith to Chelsea, I had to trudge it afoot.

For business reasons I was handsomely dressed, and wore rings on my fingers, and carried a gold watch and chain. My seal-skin coat, however, buttoned up to my throat for comfort sake, covered all my finery with the exception of the rings. Had I worn gloves, you will perhaps say, as a Christian should, these too would have been hidden. But I never liked gloves—always liked my hands naked, and at liberty. There is another thing I never get on well manage, and that is, to hold a pipe in my mouth without the assistance of my hand. For comfort sake, on my bleak journey, I smoked my pipe, and, as I said, I held it between my fingers, so that the rings thereon were distinctly to be seen.

The road from Kensington to Hyde Park Corner is never of the cheerfullest; on a dark winter's night it is unutterably dreary. Yet, as I reached the commencement of the long blank wall that faces Gore House I saw a pedestrian some distance ahead of me. I am fond of a sociable word, and the discovery was pleasant. Thinks I, if you are inclined for a chat, my friend, a mile or so of the road may be lightened.

The man ahead was walking slowly, and I very fast, so that, in a few minutes, I overtook him. While yet a few paces behind, I noticed that he was of slim build, and that his clothing was spare, and not at all adapted to the season. It was still snowing heavily; it was heaped round the rim of his hat, and his left shoulder were white with it.

"Pardon me, Sir," said I; "if you will accept the shelter of my umbrella as far as you go, you are welcome."

He bowed politely, without saying a word, and, stepping to my side, accommodated his pace to mine.

"Terrible weather, Sir!"

No response.

"Made worse in the country, I hear."

"Sir," said he, in a quick, high voice, and wheezing broad before me, "I feel much as might a rider whose horse had suddenly turned its head toward him, and exclaimed, 'Sir, I have been your whip! Throw it me this minute!' I to be stopped by a highwayman! Armed with a pistol, too!

Such a highwayman! Such a pistol! I believe I, at that time, had the honor of acquaintance with every rascal in and about London; but certainly this was not one of them. There was not an atom of ruffianism in his appearance. He evidently had been older than twenty, and his pale, boyish face was but a sorry field for ferocity. As to his "weapon," it was the shabbiest "Bramah-pan" school, with a barrel capacious enough for an ounce bullet, and a stock scarce strong enough to crack a walnut. Indeed, as shown me in terrible thing, he was content to let it dangle loosely in his hand. I was possessed of no other weapon but my umbrella, which I carefully closed, and took convenient hold of, in case of an accident.

"How long have you been at this trade, my friend?" I inquired.

"That can be of little consequence to you," replied he, with a feeble attempt at ferocity. "I am in earnest; give me your purse at once! I see you are a stout fellow (pointing at my ring). Give me your purse, and save me the crime of shooting you."

"We will settle the shooting question first," said I, at the same time suddenly twitching the Bramah-pan pistol from his hand with the crooked handle of my umbrella, and crunching it into the snow with my heel. "Now I, too, am in earnest. I am a detective-sergeant Chirrup, and you are my prisoner!"

I placed my hand on his shoulder; but he slid from beneath; slid first to his knees, and then on to his face, so might a man without hands, and there lay on the snow, as quiet and as white as it. He had fainted.

Here was a pretty predicament! What was I to do with the dead jail-bird? "Stand by him till a constable comes this way: then haul him off, and see him properly cared," That was the suggestion of John Chirrup, the officer. But there was another Chirrup, formerly a gardener at Chiswick, and out of whom Christian charity had not been entirely squeezed, in spite of many years of police blue and oil-leather stock; and the small voice of John Chirrup, the gardener, spoke up; it said, "It would be a thousand pities to take the poor wretch to prison. That he is not a practised thief is certain: he is isn't a thief at all, I believe. Look at him. Lord knows the amount of misery and privation that led him to commit this mad blunder. Let him go!"

Where? John Chirrup, the gardener, could have answered that question, or even supplied a satisfactory reason for supposing that "anywhere" "go" again, unless assisted to his legs, and started, I might have slipped half-a-crown into his waistcoat-pocket, told him under the rose, and passed on; but he lay so dead and still that this was not to be thought of. So I knelt down on the side of the prostrate young man, and chafed his temples and his hands with snow till he opened his eyes. For a moment he appeared to recognize me, and then, evidently remembering what had transpired, he buried his face in his hands, and sobbed and wept like a very small boy indeed.

"Come, young fellow," said I, "you had better bustle up, unless you wish to be frozen to death. What's the row? Have you been drinking?"

"No, God help me! no, nor eating either. Oh, my poor Clara! What an ending! What an ending!"

He made a shift to stand up as he spoke, and seeing his weak condition, I offered him my arm. "Don't hold me, please," said he. "I will walk quietly with you."

"And who is Clara?" I asked, as we walked along together.

"My wife, Sir," replied he, coolly.

"Pray what does she do while you take to the highway?"

He stopped short, and clenched his mites of fists as though about to knock me down for my impertinence; but noting my imperturbable demeanor, he altered his mind, and replied to my question.

"I will tell you, Sir, what she is doing," said he, bitterly; "she is lying ill and hungry; she is lying, awake and in the dark, listening for my return from a begging errand—as she was bid to believe—as her sister's brother-cur bid her. Poor little woman!" continued he, softly, "I hope what I so dreaded may now come soon. I hope she may die. I hope she may die before the evening, and be spared a knowledge of this!"

When John Chirrup, the gardener, heard this woeful tale, he adjourned he found Sergeant Chirrup in the most handsome manner, and compelled that functionary to put the case entirely into his hands. Said he:

"Now, look here, young man! you know as well as I do that your behavior to-night renders you liable to transportation. I have told you I am a detective-sergeant. Here's my warrant to vouch for the fact. What you have tried to do is to be gammon, and it may be truth. I'm inclined to believe you. From what you have told me, and from all you can, you may yet escape the pit to the verge of which your rashness has brought you."

He took from his pocket an old pocket-book.

"You may find something there," said he, apathetically. "that may convince you."

Without reply I opened it. There were pawnbrokers' tickets for wearing apparel; a printed notice to quit in "lock room on the second floor of the house situate 37 B——Street, Camden Town;" and a letter addressed, in a business hand, to "Mr. Thomas Slack," at the above-mentioned residence. I took the letter from its envelope and read it. It ran:

"CUSTOMER FRIEND.

"SIR,—To your repeated and impertinent applications to me for your quarter's assistance, I can only say, simply that I have nothing to give. It is clear to me that your destitution is not nearly so extreme as you would apply for relief, as your father's long payment of poor-rates entitles you, to the authorities of the parish in which you reside.

OWEN SURVE."

I had no longer any doubt as to the truth of his story, and as at the moment an empty cab happened to sail by, I hailed it, and together we took my house in Cheyne Row. I had ordered a fire and a comfortable bit of supper to be ready in my room, so that I had no difficulty in comfortably my young friend, the highwayman. We supped together, as we had rode, in perfect silence, and then I dressed a little grog, and bade him draw his chair to the fire.

"Now," said I, "tell me all about this strange business."

"First let me thank you," said he, taking my big hand between both his, and bowing his head over it—"let me thank you for your great kindness; not so much to myself as to she whose life is so tenderly woven with mine, let me say knees express my gratitude for the mercy you have showed us."

Good gracious! I wonder what Scotland Yard would have thought had it seen the ridiculous pair! I wonder how Sergeant Chirrup would have felt if Superintendent Twitcher had at that moment put his official head and neck out at the door! My young friend somewhat recovered his equanimity presently, and allowed himself to be persuaded. Then, in a tedious and roundabout way, he told me his story.

How that his father (whose only son my young friend was) and his uncle had, for many years, carried on, as partners, a shipping agency business; how that Clara, a little child of eight years, had arrived, per Firefly, from Calcutta, an orphan, and parents having died on the homeward voyage; and how, by some means, the child had found quarters at Shirv & Co.'s (the uncle's name), and was eventually adopted by the firm. How that my young friend's father, by-and-by, died; and how his brother Owen made out, to the satisfaction of those whose business it was, that the defunct shipping-agent was not his partner at all, but only his paid servant, and that the business and its belongings was his entirely, including the accumulated profits. How after this, his nephew, Thomas, was honored with a seat among the junior clerks, at a slender salary. How that Clara grew up, in Owen shirv's house, from a pretty child to a beautiful young woman; how that young Thomas made successful love to her. How that grey-headed Owen Shirv made love to her too, and offered her his loan old hand in marriage. How that the frightened little maid smiled not encouragement at it, but carried the dismal intelligence to junior clerk Thomas, who married her out of hand; and how that presently the uncle-husband began to be annoying the junior clerk off his stool and out of the house, barring the door to his further entrance.

Since that time, now a year ago (and yet Thomas Shirv was only twenty-two next birthday), there had been a gradual drawing of sufferers for the silly young couple. Thomas had tried law-writing and keeping the accounts of dilatory tradesmen, and almost everything else but that which he tried "light-portering" over, but his strength had failed beneath the burden-bearing, and he was quite ill, he was expected to carry. He had been ill about, one time for five weeks, and another time for two months. His wife, in the first fit, and there had been a baby born and buried within the last month, and the undertaker, almost as clamorous as the landlady, dunning at the door, and objecting to the little mob that generally collected the feets at the cass: "what a funeral!" exclaimed he it was; how they would have it kivered with white cloth; and how, after all, he had only got half his money. He wasn't going to be done, he said. What was the parish for but to carry such beggars' brats? This, among other kindred circumstances, it was I had inclosed my young friend's letter to his ever-ceast, purchase the Brummagem pistol, and take to the road.

There was nothing to be done that night, so I made Master Thomas a bed on the sofa, and then retired for a few hours' rest. Breakfast and our first business in the morning should be a visit to B——— Street, Camden Town.

He came springing at my door before daylight.

"I beg your pardon, Sir," said he; "I don't know what time you usually rise, but I am thinking it is growing late."

Late! it was scarcely six o'clock, and thanks to his precious anxiety, I had slept about about more than three hours. Half asleep as I was, I wonder I did not tell him so. But I was not tired I did that he had had his night overnight what were my intentions, and he must have been in a pretty pucker or to have thought me asleep.

He wanted to come with me; but that I would not hear of. I promised to make a plausible excuse to his wife for his absence, and begged him to make all haste back to him. I told him to go down to the kitchen, and sit with my housekeeper till I returned.

I found B——— Street in the most wretched part of Camden Town, and No. 37 B——— presented a house in it. Knocking at the door, I inquired if Mrs. Shirv lived there.

Replied the landlady, who came slumbling up the passage, lifting the corner of her apron nervously,

"I don't know what answer to make, master. They did live here, as their unfort'nate rent-book is a ready witness; but he has been away these two days, and she—"

"Mrs. Shirv will do as well," interrupted I, pushing past her, and beginning to ascend the stairs. "Which is the room?"

"Second floor back. I s'pose you're the undertaker, and have come about it?"

"About what?"

"About the poor crestur being dep't."

Poor little highwayman! Poor little Eastern maid, who had shunned old love for young!

"Out I tell you!" said I, angrily.

"Well, you can if you are quick; we have sent for the beadle, who will nail up the door till the coroner holds his quest on her."

She went first up two flights of stairs, and then opened a door. Here, on a bed beside bedstead, she lay: her hands folded over her bosom, her raven hair heaped on either side of the pillow, making her pale cheeks look paler by contrast. Awfully beautiful she looked as she lay there, making such solemn stillness that the creaking of the door seemed a profane thing, and nothing one more bitterly than ever to regret the steppers of the stairs—like Sergeant Chirrup's—to be heard. On a table by the side of the bed, along with a water-jug and a medicine-phial, was an ink-bottle, with a pen in it.

"Oh yes, Sir, she had been writing," elucidated the landlady, rightly interpreting my looks. "This is what it was," I thought I had better keep it for the owner."

She gave me, as she spoke, a scrap of paper. Written on it was a few words addressed to her husband, telling him that she had him awoke till she was dead, struck her, as she had done, she had experienced so strange a desire to sleep, that she thought she might never wake again; so she wrote him, that he might not be frightened when, for her sake, give up his bitter thoughts against Uncle Owen; God bless and keep him for his constant love, and farewell till they met hereafter.

I put the precious note in my pocket, compromising with the landlady's scruples, as to whether I had a right to it, by settling the arrears of rent. Then I wrote a an undertaker's for the one, luckily, who had buried the baby), and gave him orders to take possession of and decently bury the body when the coroner had done with it.

I hardly knew whether it would be better for me to hasten to young Shirv with the woeful news, or to go right on to Crutched Friars and see what comfort I could get for him there. Finally, I resolved on the latter course.

I found Shirv's shipping-office and I found Mr. Owen Shirv in his private counting-house. He was by no means a nice person to look at. Although but a little past forty, a life of avarice and cunning in every family, wounder at the total absence of either in Nephew Thomas crossed at once. Here it was, you could see it and to spare, leaking out in a dozen different points of the old ship-broker's face. His eyes, his cheeks were blinking and watery; in his nose, which was sharp and shrewish; in his stubbly, bristling hair, and in his cold yellow teeth.

"Well, Mr. Chirrup," said he, looking uneasy, and tapping with my card, "to what may I attribute the favor of your visit?"

"You have a nephew, I believe, Sir," said I, coming to the point at once; "a young fellow named Thomas Shirv?"

"I am so afflicted," replied he, grinning savagely.

"He wrote you a letter lately, I believe?"

"A letter, Sir! He has written me fifty, the whining, canting rascal; each one containing enough of squalor and sickness to plague a town. Here are a few of them; read them, and judge for yourself."

He opened a drawer, and taking from it a little parcel of letters, handed them to me across the table. I opened and read them carefully. There was much of imploring and humble appeal; but there was nothing to warrant the acknowledgment for a single shilling.

"Well, Sir," said I, "this is all true—less than true, if any thing."

"What! have you come here to defend them?" exclaimed the old man, turning himself into a rage. "What pity can I have for him, the silly dog? Go away, Sir. Let me hear no more of the whining knave or the ungrateful wanton, his wife."

"She's dead," said I.

"Dead!" and he looked as does a man who dreams he has cause for shrieking and can not.

"Died last night in a dog-hole of a place, Camden Town way; all alone, too, and in the dark. She endeavored to write to you, and failed in the attempt. Your name is mentioned in it, Sir, and you may as well read it." I handed it to him, and he took it in his money, standing with his back to me while he read it.

"And he," said the old man, still with his back to me, "and he is dead, indeed, where was he when he shut she died alone?"

"Out; engaged in highway robbery," replied I. He turned round quick as lightning.

"Good God! is that true" said he.

"He was caught in the act," I replied.

It was a bitter cold morning; so cold that from a projecting ledge above sickles hung down before me to window of the counting-house: icy and glazing July with Mr. Shirv: beads of perspiration trickled down his face as he walked to and fro the room.

"By to-morrow morning, I suppose," said he, at last, "every one connected with this affair will know the accursed news that this felon, this highwayman, is my nephew."

"No doubt, Sir," said I, quietly.

"It mustn't be: I'd give five hundred pounds rather," he said, and paused for lengthy pause, and, turning sharply to me, he continued, "But what brings you here? I presume you have not paid me this visit for the purpose of communicating to me the news of my nephew's disgrace? Maybe you are able to suggest some means by which this gossiping may be stopped?"

Nothing more lucky for the broaching of my plans could have happened than this last observation.

"Well, Sir," replied I, "I am happy to tell you that there is a way by which all scandal may be disgrace. It happens, very fortunately for all concerned, that the party attacked by your nephew is a particular friend of mine. He is a tiger from this friend of mine, and could, if he had chosen, made short work of his assailant; but there was something so singular in the manner that he simply disarmed him, and gave him into my custody. Diligent inquiry has convinced me, the painful story to be told, and my friend has resolved to give him another chance to lead an honest life, on one condition. That some one will undertake him with sufficient means to leave the country, and to start fair in some English colony—Canada, for instance."

"Provided I find the money?" snapped Mr. Shirv. "Speak out, man. How much?"

"Not much, Sir. Fifty a fifth of the sum you suggested, Sir," I replied; "about one hundred pounds."

There was a silence of at least a minute; at last said he,

"I know nothing of your friend, Mr. Chirrup; if I supply this money, will you see it properly applied?"

"I will give you a written promise to do so, Sir?"

"And you will see poor Clo—will see his wife buried?"

"I will."

"Here, then," said he, "is a check for a hundred and twenty pounds. Be sure you make him understand how and why I give it him. Tell him I believe it is for the best, because a curse on the cur of a dog, before I threw him in the river. Bring me certain news, my good Sir, within seven days, that he is out of the country, and I will make you a pretty present."

Scarcely able to believe in my tremendous success, I left the shipping-office, and hurried home straight. How I broke to him the doleful news of his wife's death, and how he bemoaned her; are pictures I don't at all care to dwell on. Within the next seven days I took to Crutched Friars news of the sailing of Thomas Shirv for Canada.

HUMORS OF THE DAY

AN ACCEPTANCE OF OBEDIENCE.—An old Connecticut parson, whose peculiarities of preaching were proverbial, and who was blessed with a temper of equal virtue, was one day told by a parishioner that he did not like his sermons. "Well," said the old man, "I don't wonder at it. I don't like 'em myself."

What medical merriment has had an honorary degree conferred upon it?—Riddle D. D.

An artist painted a cannon so natural, the other day, that when he finished the touch-hole it went off. Sorry to say he was killed on the spot by the bursting.

"So there's another corruption of Mount Vesuvius," said Mrs. Partington, as she put up her spec. "The paper tells us that mount burning leather running down the mountain, but it don't tell how it got a-fire."

"Didn't you tell me, Sir, you could hold the plow?" asked a farmer of a gentleman who had called to take on trial. "Aresh, he sang now" said Pat. "How the deuce could I hold the plow when I had to carry it away from me? But give it to me in the barn, and he'll bet I'll hould it as well as any man."

The constable fastens out West must be particularly attractive. The young ladies there have adopted the ludicrous custom of forming a line, and for a given price permitting the constable to take a running kiss of the lot. Who wouldn't be in newfoundland under such circumstances? "I'm game," was his reply to objection to the "running." One would like to linger over such a work of charity.

If there is any better advertisement extant than this, in the Cairo Gazette, let it be sent on: "Lost!—A short stout pup, about the size and age of a young dogs of his breed. Has a remarkable dislike to cats and children. Died on whom she left a pair of nicely bobbed ears, a long tail, and a habit of barking at the moon. The finder will receive I will be paid for the recovery of this interesting animal."

THE TWO SISTERS.—A gentleman, with the same Christian and surname, took lodgings in the same house with two ladies. The gentleman requested to have a number of calls and letters. Indeed, the postman had no alternative but to deliver them at number one. The ladies, not to be imposed upon, sent a message to the gentleman, "We understand you have several letters for us." "Because you are Jones the second, and your sister Jones the first."

Mr. Bunting, a well-known literary gentleman, while reading one of his articles for the press, corrected it as she went along—and there were many corrections, indeed. "Why, husband," she exclaimed, "you don't know the first rules of composition. You use the very worst grammar." "Well, my love," he exclaimed, looking up from his work, "you and I are not the public." "But you always use the words of our sex in the plural, and write it in the singular sometimes. I'm sure it isn't help it," was the retort; "woman's a singular being."

My friend, the foreigner, called on me to bid farewell before he left London. "I am sorry to hear you are going," I said. "I am going at the country." I ventured to correct his pleonastic style by saying that he were escalated to say, "I am going into the country." He thanked me for the correction, said he would be sure to remember it, and then left me to the next door on my return."

"My dear friend," said a devoted wife, "why will you not leave off smoking? It is such an odious practice, and then it is so unwholesome as well." "My dear," replied the husband, "not only consider the time I have devoted, and the money I have spent, to learn to smoke, but I should have off now, all that time and money would have been wasted, don't you see?"

Dr. Cadogan, of Charles the Second's time, swayed at his wife a wealthy lady, over whose property he had undue influence. Her relations, jealous of the doctor's power, were two important pokes figuring under the head of "sextet" in the list of the lady's last surviving. Accordingly a few months in alternate fits of jealous hate and jealous fondness, they succeeded in getting her bed to a state of hysterical egress, exclaiming: "Ah! he has killed me at last!" "Poisoned!" cried the friends of the bride, turning up the whites of their eyes. "Ah! gracious goodness!" cried the lady, "I am poisoned, I feel it! no one can save me!" asked the doctor, with surprise. "I never proposed to do so," replied the lady, "I regarded it as done with." Before the doctor's departure, he requested to be allowed to bid the bride a death-struggle. "Ladies," said he, "before I leave you, I must request you to send for Mrs. Cadogan." Mrs. Cadogan was soon seated, and in a few days after the bride's decease, "I am poisoned," cried the doctor, "and you have killed me, and then you'll discover the colonies."

THE NEW NOBLEMAN.—Henry VIII. designed to send a nobleman on an embassy to Francis I. at a very dangerous period. Somerset refused to be employed, saying that such a threatening message to so bad-tempered a prince as Francis I. would be sure to cost him his head. "Have no fear, my lord," said Henry, "if the French king should take away your life, I promise you that I will make you a duke." "Ah, gracious lord," cried Somerset, "if you have the power to make dukes, you have also the power to make kings." "Then," said Henry, "if the French king should take away your life, I will make you a king." "But among all these honors," said Somerset, "there may not be one to fit my shoulders."

"Mamma," said a young lady to her mother, "what is cashmere?" "Simply ting, dear, is a young lady going to live in Australia."

"What is ordinating, mamma?" "Ordinating, my dear, is sending something there and having a family."

"Mamma, I should like to go Australia."

MR. ROBIN'S ARMS.—A Horse-pistol, and a Colt's revolver.

WANTED TO KNOW.—If a man "assumes a path," is the path supposed to run away from him? Of what thickness is a "line of conduct?" When a clerk "runs down," does he overtake itself?

"Bridget, where's the gridiron?" "Ax'n' sure, ma'am, Dr. Sot ofice giving it to the tinker to mend." "Bridget, you know that this thing's so full of holes it's no good at all."

An old lady from a temperance village lately attended a party at which champagne was served. On the first glass being called upon to take a glass. She drank too, when, enacted to the effect, she exclaimed: "Well, it may be a wicked drink, but it's good."

Simon.—"Good-morning, George; how did you get along in the storm last night?"

George.—"Capital; we voted unanimously not to have any thing more to do with the Union."

"Dora, what did you do with that tallow that Mr. Jones greased his boots with this morning?" "Please, ma'am, I put it in the dumplings for dinner." "Oh, did you? I wish you had wasted it."

A master bade his servant go and see what time the sun had ascended. "Why, Sir," expostulated the servant, "it is night." "What does that matter? Can you not take a candle?"

Last Sunday a young clergyman in an adjoining town endeavored to illustrate to his congregation the difference between the moon and the sun; and to explain its location on the night of eclipse, concluded that either between the earth and the moon passing between us and the sun, and that was the way the eclipse was produced" or "the moon passing between the earth and the sun, and that was the way the eclipse was produced" I forget which. The congregation appreciated the information.

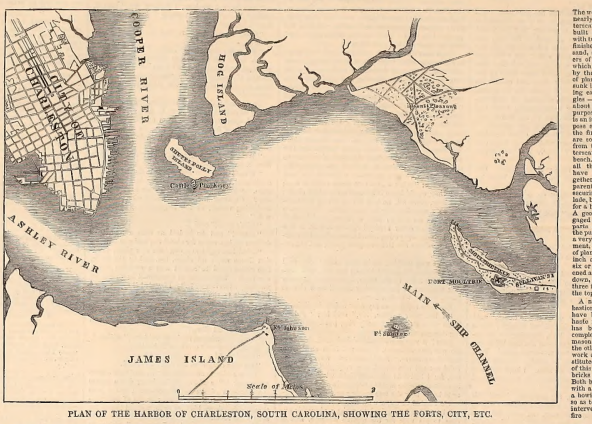
THE FORTS AND HARBOR OF CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.

PROFILE VIEW OF THE HARBOR OF CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, SHOWING THE CITY AND FORTS.

THE accompanying Plan and View will enable our readers to understand the discussions which are pending in the papers on the subject of the Harbor of Charleston and the United States Forts situate therein. The latter are three in number: CASTLE PINCKNEY, FORT SUMTER, and FORT MOULTRIE on Sullivan's Island. The latter, which is the most important of the three, is held by one of the most gallant officers in the service—Major Anderson, of 24 Artillery, with only fifty-six men. The President has refused, in spite of the earnest appeals of General Scott, General Cass, Mrs. Anderson, and others, to reinforce Major Anderson; and in case of an attack upon FORT MOULTRIE he and his gallant little band would doubtless perish to a man. The Charleston Mercury thus describes the forts:

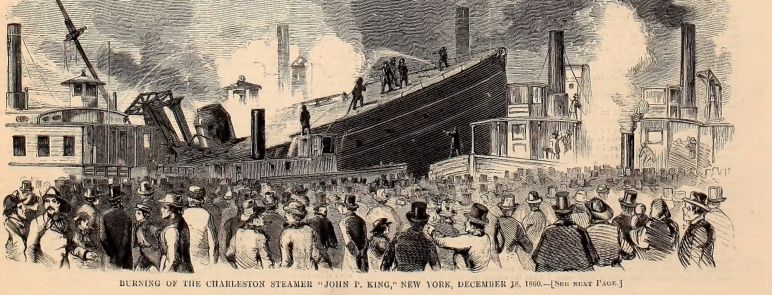
FORT MOULTRIE

is an inclosed water battery, having a front on the southern water side, of about 100 feet, and a rear of about 540 feet. It is built with salient and re-entering angles on all sides, and is admirably adapted for defence, either from the attack of a storming party or by regular approaches.



The outer and inner walls are of brick, capped with stone, and filled in with earth, making a solid wall fifteen or sixteen feet in thickness. The work now in progress consists in cleaning the sand from the walls; ditching it around, and erecting a glacis; closing up the postern-gates in the east and west walls, and, instead, cutting sally-ports, which lead into strong outworks on the northeast and southwest angles, in which twelve-pounder howitzer guns will be placed, cobbling the garrison to sweep the ditch on three sides with grape and canister. The northwest angle of the fort has also been strengthened by a bastionette, to sustain the weight of a heavy gun which will command the main street of the island. The main entrance has also been better secured, and a trap-door, two feet square, cut in the door for ingress and egress. At this time the height of the wall, from the bottom of the ditch to the top of the parapet, is twenty feet. The ditch is from twelve to fifteen feet wide at the base, and fifteen feet deep. The nature of the soil would not seem to admit of this depth being increased, quick-sand having been reached in many places.

The work on the south side is nearly finished. The counterscarp is substantially built of plank, and spread with turf. The glacis is also finished. It is composed of sand, and covered with layers of boom and turf, all of which is kept firmly in place by the addition of sections of plank nailed to uprights sunk in the sand, and crossing each other at right angles—making squares of about six feet. For the purpose of the glacis, which is an inclined plane, is to expose an attacking party to the fire of the guns—which are so placed as to sweep it from the crest of the counterscarp to the edge of the beach. On the north side, all the wooden guns have been placed close together on the ramparts, apparently for the purpose of securing it against an assailable, but possibly as a screen for a battery of heavy guns. A good many men are engaged in clearing the ramparts of turf and earth, for the purpose of putting down a very ugly-looking arrangement which consists of strips of plank two inches wide, one end of which is fixed in the earth six or eight feet long, sharpened at the point, and nailed down, so as to project about three feet horizontally from the top of the walls.



A noticeable fort in the bastionettes, to which we have before alluded, is the basis in which one of them has been built. The one completed is formed of solid masonry. In constructing the other, however, a frame-work of plank has been substituted. Against the sides of this wooden outwork loose bricks have been placed. Both bastionettes are armed with a small carronade and a howitzer pointed laterally so as to command the whole intervening moat by a cross-fire.

FORT SUMTER,

a work of solid masonry, octagonal in form, pierced on the north, east, and west sides with a double row of port-holes for the heaviest guns, and on the south or land side, in addition to openings for guns, loop-holed for musketry, stands

BURNING OF THE CHARLESTON STEAMER "JOHN P. KING," NEW YORK, DECEMBER 18, 1860.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

In the middle of the harbor on the edge of the ship channel, and said to be bomb-proof. It is at present without any regular garrison. There is a large force of workmen —some one hundred and fifty in all—employed upon it, mounting the guns and otherwise putting this great strategic point in order. The armament of Fort Sumter consists of 140 guns, many of them being the formidable ten-inch Columbiads, each three cubic feet shot or shell, and which have a fearful range. Only a few of these are yet in position, and the work of mounting piece of this caliber in the casemates is necessarily a slow one. There is also a large amount of military stores, consisting of some 40,000 pounds of powder, and a proportionate quantity of shot and shell. The workmen employed are divided into forty-eight, owing to the want of any regular communication with the city, the wharf or landing is on the south side, and is of course exposed to a cross-fire from all the batteries on Sullivan's Island.

CASTLE PINCKNEY

Is located on the southern extremity of a narrow slip of marsh land, which extends in a northerly direction to Big Island channel. On the harbor side the ocean current presents a circular front. It has never been considered of much consequence as a fortress, although its proximity to the city would give it importance, if properly armed and garrisoned. From hasty observation we find that there are about fifteen guns mounted on the parapet; the majority of these are lighting and sixty-four pounders. Some "Columbiads" are, however, within the walls. There are also supplies of powder, shot, and shell at present there is no garrison at the post; the only residents are one or two workmen, who have charge of the harbor light. Some thirty or forty day-laborers are employed repairing the sisters and putting the place generally in order.

This concludes our sketch of the present aspect of affairs in the three forts, which were meant to be, and which should have been, at once the pride and the bulwark of our city.

Fort Moultrie is about 3½ miles from the city of Charleston. It is, however, within easy cannon range of Mount Pleasant, and might be attacked from the village of Moultrieville.

BURNING OF THE STEAMER "JOHN P. KING."

We publish on the preceding page an engraving of the destruction of the new Charleston steamship John P. King, which made her trial-trip last Monday. She was lying at her wharf, North River, when she took fire at about 8 A.M. on 18th inst.; the flames soon burst through the deck, and became irresistible. As she was undergoing only other shipping she was towed into the stream and took off the Battery in short water. She was built by Westervelt for Spofford & Tileston; cost $160,000, and was insured for $75,000. Her tonnage, by measurement, was 1650 tons. She was built expressly for the passenger trade between New York and Charleston. Rumor asserts that she would have carried a Palmetto Flag.

CHAPTER IX.

WHEN I reached home my sister was very curious to know all about Miss Havisham's, and asked a number of questions. And I soon found myself getting heavily bumped in the nape of the neck and the small of the back, and my face ignominiously shoved against the kitchen wall, because I did not answer those questions at sufficient length.

If a dread of not being understood be hidden in the breasts of young people to any thing like the extent to which it used to be hidden in mine—which I consider probable, as I have no particular reason to suspect myself of having been a monstrosity—it is the key to many reservations. I felt convinced that if I described Miss Havisham's to my eyes and ears, they would not be understood. Not only that, but I felt convinced that Miss Havisham too would not be understood; and although she was perfectly incomprehensible to me, I entertained an impression that there would be something coarse and treacherous in my dragging her (to say nothing of Miss Estella) before the contemplation of Mrs. Joe. Consequently, I said as little as I could, and had my face shoved against the kitchen wall.

The worst of it was that that bullying old Pumblechook, preyed upon by a devouring curiosity to be informed of all I had seen and heard, came gaping over his shin-deep post into mine to have the details divulged to him. And the mere sight of the torment, with his fishy eyes and mouth, and his sandy hair inquisitively on end, and his waistcoat heaving with windy arithmetic, made me vicious in my reticence.

"Well, boy," Uncle Pumblechook began, as soon as he was seated in the chair of honor by the fire. "how old you get on up yonder?"

I answered, "Pretty well, Sir," and my sister shook her fist at me.

"Pretty well?" Mr. Pumblechook repeated. "Pretty well is no answer. Tell us what you mean by pretty well, boy?"

Whitewash on the forehead hardens the brain into a state of obstinacy, perhaps. Any how, with whitewash from the wall on my forehead, my obstinacy was adamantine. I reflected for some time, and then answered, "I mean pretty well."

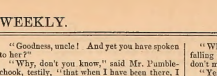
My sister, with an exclamation of impatience, was going to fly at me—I had no shadow of defense, for Joe was busy in the forge—when Mr. Pumblechook interposed with, "No! Don't lose your temper. Leave this lad to me, ma'am; leave this lad to me." Mr. Pumblechook then turned my forehead from, as if he were going to cut my hair or take out one of my teeth, or perform some such operation, and said:

"First (to get our thoughts in order): Forty-three pence?"

I calculated the consequences of replying "Four Hundred Pound," and, finding them against me, went as near the answer as I could —which was somewhat about eighteen pence off. Mr. Pumblechook then put me through my pence-table from "twelve pence make one shilling" up to "forty pence make three-and-four pence," and then triumphantly demanded, as if he had done for me, "Now? How much is forty-three pence?" To which I replied, after a long interval of reflection, "I don't know." And I was so aggravated that I almost doubt if I did know.

Mr. Pumblechook worked his head like a screw to screw it out of me, and said, "Is forty-three pence seven and sixpence three farden, for instance?"

"Yes!" said I. And although my sister instantly boxed my ears, it was highly gratifying to me to see that the answer spoilt his joke, and brought him to a dead stop.



"Boy! What like is Miss Havisham?" Mr. Pumblechook began again when he had recovered; folding his arms tight on his chest and applying the screw.

"Very tall and dark," I told him.

"Is she, uncle?" asked my sister.

Mr. Pumblechook winked assent; from which I at once inferred that he had never seen Miss Havisham, for she was nothing of the kind.

"Good!" Mr. Pumblechook conceitedly. "This is the way to have him! We are beginning to hold our own, I think, Mum?"

"LEAVE THIS LAD TO ME, MA'AM; LEAVE THIS LAD TO ME."

"I am sure, uncle," returned Mrs. Joe, "I wish you had him always; you know so well how to deal with him."

"Now, boy! What was she doing, when you went in to-day?" asked Mr. Pumblechook.

"She was sitting," I answered, "in a black velvet couch."

Mr. Pumblechook and Mrs. Joe stared at one another—as they well might—and both repeated, "In a black velvet couch?"

"Yes," said I. "And Miss Estella—that's her niece, I think—handed her in cake and wine at the east-end window, on a gold plate. And we all had cake and wine on gold plates. And I drank to the couch the couch to eat mine, because she told me to."

"Was any body else there?" asked Mr. Pumblechook.

"Four dogs," said I.

"Large or small?"

"Immense," said I. "And they fought for veal cutlets out of a silver basket."

Mrs. Pumblechook and Mrs. Joe stared at one another again, in utter amazement. I was perfectly frantic—a reckless witness under the torture—and would have told them any thing.

"Where was this couch, in the name of gracious?" asked my sister.

"In Miss Havisham's room." They stared again. "But there weren't any horses to it." I added this saving clause, in the moment of rejecting four richly caparisoned coursers which I had had wild thoughts of harnessing.

"Can she walk, uncle?" asked Mrs. Joe. "What can the boy mean?"

"I'll tell you, Mum," said Mr. Pumblechook. "My opinion is, it's a sedan-chair. She's flighty, you know—very flighty—quite flighty enough to pass her days in a sedan-chair."

"Did you ever see her in it, uncle?" asked Mrs. Joe.

"How could I?" he returned, forced to the admission, "when I never see her in my life? Never clapped eyes upon her?"

"Goodness, uncle! And yet you have spoken to her?"

"Why, don't you know," said Mr. Pumblechook, testily, "that when I have been there, I have been took up to the outside of her door, and the door has stood ajar, and she has spoke to me that way. Don't say that you don't know that, Mum. However, the boy went there to play. What did you play at, boy?"

"We played with cards," I said, (I beg to observe that I think of myself with amazement, when I recall the lies I told on this occasion.)

"Pigs!" echoed my sister.

"Yes, said I. "Estella waved a blue flag, and I waved a red one, and Miss Havisham waved a green one, and we all rode over with little gold stars, out at the coach-window. And then we all waved our swords and hurrahed."

"Swords!" repeated my sister. "Where did you get swords from?"

"Out of a cupboard," said I. "And I saw pistols in it—and jam—and pills. And there was no daylight in the room, but it was all lighted up with candles."

"That's true, Mum," said Mr. Pumblechook, with a grave nod. "That's the state of the case, for that much I've seen myself." And then they both stared at me, and I with an obstinately vacant countenance of gloomy contentment stared at them, and plaited the right leg of my trowsers with my right hand.

If they had asked me any more questions I should undoubtedly have betrayed myself, for I felt that even then at the point of mentioning that there was a balloon in the yard, and should have hazarded the statement but for my mind being divided between that phenomenon and a bear in the brewery. They were so much occupied, however, in discussing the marvels I had already presented for their consideration that I escaped. The subject still held them when Joe came in from his work to have a cup of tea, to whom my sister, more for the relief of her own mind than for the gratification of his, related my pretended experiences.

Now, when I saw Joe open his blue eyes and roll them all round the kitchen in helpless astonishment, I was overtaken by penitence; but only as regarded him—not in the least as regarded the other two. Toward Joe, and Joe only, I considered myself a young monster, while they sat shaking their heads. No one would come to me from Miss Havisham's acquaintance and favor. They had no doubt that Miss Havisham would "do something" for me; their doubts related to the form that something would take. My sister stood out "for property." Mr. Pumblechook was in favor of a handsome premium for binding me apprentice to some genteel trade—the corn and seed trade for instance. Joe fell into the deepest disgrace with both, for offering the frightful suggestion that I might only be presented with one of the dogs who had fought for the veal-cutlets. "If a fool's head can't express better notions than that," said my sister, "and you have got any work to do you had better go and do it." So he went.

After Mr. Pumblechook had driven off, and when my sister was washing up, I stole into the forge to Joe, and remained by him until he had done for the night. Then I said, "Before the fire goes quite out, Joe, I should like to tell you something."

"Should you, Pip?" said Joe, drawing his sleeving-coat near the forge. "Then tell us. What is it, Pip?"

"Joe," said I, taking hold of his rolled up shirt-sleeve, and twisting it between my finger and thumb, "you remember all that about Miss Havisham's?"

"Remember?" said Joe. "I believe you! Wonderful!"

"It's a terrible thing, Joe; it ain't true."

"What are you telling of, Pip?" cried Joe, falling back in the greatest amazement. "You don't mean to say it's—"

"Yes I do; it's lies, Joe."

"But not all of it? Why sure you don't mean to say, Pip, that there was no black welwetco—eh?"

For I stood shaking my head. "But at least there was dogs, Pip, Come, Pip," said Joe, persuasively, "if there warn't no welvet-cutlets, at least there was dogs?"

"No, Joe."

"A dog?" said Joe. "A puppy? Come?"

"No, Joe, there was nothing at all like that."

As I fixed my eyes hopelessly on Joe, Joe contemplated me in dismay. "Pip, old chap! this won't do, old fellow! I say! where do you expect to go to?"

"It's terrible, Joe; ain't it?"

"Terrible?" cried Joe. "Awful! What possessed you?"

"I don't know what possessed me, Joe," I replied, letting his shirt-sleeve go, and sitting down in the ashes at his feet, hanging my head; "but I wish you hadn't come, and I wish I was dead. I've come to wish I was dead a great deal to-day."

And then I told Joe that I felt very miserable, and that I hadn't been able to explain myself to Mrs. Joe and Pumblechook, who were too rude to me, and that there had been a beautiful young lady at Miss Havisham's who was dreadfully proud, and that she had said I was common, and that I knew I was common, and that I wished I was not common, and that she did not like me because of it somehow, though I didn't know how.

This was a case of metaphysics, at least as difficult for Joe to deal with as for me. But Joe took the case altogether out of the region of metaphysics, and by that means got the better of it.

"There's one thing you may be sure of, Pip," said Joe, after some rumination, "namely, that live is law. However they come, they didn't ought to come, and they come from the father of lies, and work round to the same. Don't you tell no more of 'em, Pip. That's my belief. We've got out of being common, and that's what we do to being common, I don't make it out at all clear. You are common enough, dear old Pip, you're no common small. Likewise you're an uncommon scholar."

"No, I am ignorant and backward, Joe."

"Why, see what a letter you wrote last night. Wrote in print even! I've seen writing—Ah! and from gentlefolks!—that I'll swear weren't wrote in print," said Joe.

"I have learned next to nothing, Joe. You think much of me. It's only that."

"Well, Pip," said Joe, "be it so or be it son't, you must be a common scholar afore you can be an uncommon one, I should hope! The king upon his throne, with his crown upon his ed, can't sit and write his acts of Parliament in print, without having begun, when he were a topmost Prince, with his a-b-ab—Ah!" added Joe, with a shake of the head that was full of meaning, "and begun at A, and worked his way to Z. And I know what that is to do, though I can't say I've done it."

There was some hope in this piece of wisdom, and it rather encouraged me.

Whether common ones as to calling and earning," pursued Joe, reflectively, "mightn't be the better of continuing for to keep company with common ones, instead of going out to play with uncommon ones—which reminds me to hope that there were a fog perhaps?"

"No, Joe."

"(I'm sorry there weren't a fog, Pip.) Whether that might be or mightn't be, is a thing as can't be looked into now, with your sister on the Rampage; and that's a thing not to be thought of as long as done intentional. Lookee here, Pip, at what is said to you by a true friend. Which this to you the true friend say. If you can't get to be uncommon through going straight, you'll never do it through going crooked. So don't tell no more on 'em, Pip, and live where you did the living."

"You are not angry with me, Joe?"

"No, old chap. But bearing in mind that them were which I meantersay of a stunning and thundering sort—alluding to them which bordered on public-executes and such-like—a sincere well-wisher would advise, Pip, their being dropped into your meditations when you go to bed." That's all, old chap, and don't never do it no more."

And as I got up to my little room and said my prayers, I did not forget Joe's recommendation, and yet my young mind was in that distracted and unsettled state that I thought long after I laid me down, how common Estella would consider Joe, a mere blacksmith, how thick his hands were, and how coarse his hands. I thought how Joe and my sister were then sitting in the kitchen, and how I had come up to bed from the kitchen, and how Miss Havisham and Estella never sat in a kitchen, but were far above the level of such common doings. I fell asleep recalling what I "used to do" when I was at Miss Havisham's; as though I had been there weeks or months, instead of hours, and as though it were quite an old subject of remembrance, instead of one that had arisen only that day.

That was a memorable day to me, for it made great changes in me and in my fortunes. But it is the same with any life. Imagine one selected day struck out of it, and think how different its course would have been. Pause you who read this, and think for a moment of the long chain of iron or gold, of thorns or flowers, that would never have bound you, but for the formation of the first link on one memorable day.

CHAPTER X.

THE felicitous idea occurred to me a morning or two later when I woke, that the best step I sould take toward making myself uncommon was to get out of Biddy every thing she knew, and to pay the strictest attention to Mr. Wopsle when he read aloud. In pursuance of this luminous conception I mentioned to Biddy when I went to Mr. Wopsle's great-aunt's at night, that I had a particular reason for wishing to get on in life, and that I should feel very much obliged to her if she would impart all her learning to me. Biddy, who was the most obliging of girls, immediately said she would, and began to carry out her promise within five minutes.

The Educational scheme so Comer established by Mr. Wopsle's great-aunt may be resolved into the following synopsis. The pupils ate apples and put apples on their mother's backs, until Mr. Wopsle's great-aunt collected her energies, and made an indiscriminate totter at them with a birch-rod. After receiving the charge with every mark of derision, the pupils formed in line and banged round a sugar-loaf mounted on a hand to hand. The book had an alphabet in it, some figures and tables, and a little spelling—that is to say, a little way on. As soon as this volume began to circulate, Mr. Wopsle's great-aunt fell into a state of coma; arising either from sleep or a paroxysm of rheumatism. The pupils then entered among themselves upon a competitive examination on the subject of letters, with the view of ascertaining who could read the hardest upon whose toes. This mental exercise lasted until Biddy made a rush at the book, contributed three Defarged Bibles, shaped as if they had been unskilfully cut off the cheap end of something, and subsided panting. I had by that time any curiosities of literature I have since met with, perspiring over it with my sleeve, and having various specimens of the insect world smashed between their leaves. This part of the Course was usually finished by a good deal of combats between Biddy and refractory students. When the fights were over, Biddy gave out the number of the page at which the read aloud what we could—or what we couldn't—in a frightful chorus; Mr. Wopsle leading with a high monotonous voice, and none of us having the least notion what we were reading about. When this horrible din had lasted a quarter of an hour, mechanically awoke Mr. Wopsle's great-aunt, who staggered at a boy and forthwith pulled his ears. This was understood to terminate the Course for the evening, and we emerged into the air with a gasping sensation behind the ears. It is fair to remark that there was no prohibition against any pupil's entertaining himself with a slate or even a pencil, but that was not supposed, but that it was not easy to pursue that branch of study in the winter season, on account of the little general sleep in which the fingers were holden—and which was also Mr. Wopsle's great-aunt's slumbrous and indiscriminate right. I faithfully illuminated through the agency of one low-spirited dip-candle and no snuffers.

It appeared to me that it would take time to become uncommon under these circumstances: nevertheless, I resolved to try it, and that very evening Biddy entered on our special proceedings by imparting some information from her little stock to me. Pursuing the thread of some users of sugar, and lending me, to copy at home, a German text or old English D which she had imitated from the handing of some second-hand shop which I supposed, until she told me what it was, to be a design for a bedrock.

Of course there was a public-house in the village, and of course Joe liked sometimes to smoke his pipe there. I had received strict orders from my sister to call for him at the Three Jolly Bargemen, that evening, on my way from school, and bring him home at my peril. To the Three Jolly Bargemen, therefore, I directed my steps.

There was a bar at the Jolly Bargemen, with some alarming-looking liquor-casks behind it, on a wall at the side of the door, which seemed to me to be full of guns. They belonged to gunsmiths, but since I could remember, and had grown more than I had. But there was a quantity of reddish coal in the country, and some of the people neglected no opportunity of turning it to account.

It being Saturday night, I found the landlord looking rather grimly at these records; but as my business was with Joe and not with him, I merely wished him good-evening, and passed into the common room at the end of the passage, where was a bright fire. Joe was sitting by the fire, and where Joe was smoking his pipe in company with Mr. Wopsle and a stranger. Joe greeted me on my entering with "Pip, old chap!" and the moment he said that, the stranger turned his head and looked at me.

He was a secret-looking man whom I had never seen before. His head was all on one side, and one of his eyes was half shut up, as if he were making aim at something with an invisible gun. He had a pipe in his mouth, and he took it out, and, after slowly blowing all the smoke away and looking hard at me all the time, nodded. So I nodded, and then he nodded again, and made room on the settle beside him that I might sit down there.

But as I was not sure that Joe knew whenever I entered that place of resort, I said "No, thank you, sir," and fell into the space Joe made for me on the opposite settle. The stranger then, after glancing at Joe, and seeing that his attention was closely engaged, looked down at me again when I had taken my seat, and then rubbed his leg in a very odd way, as it struck me.

"You was saying," said the stranger man, turning to Joe, "that you was a blacksmith."

"Yes, I said it, you know," said Joe.

"What'll you drink, Mr. ——? You didn't mention your name, by-the-by."

Joe mentioned it now, and the stranger man called him by it. "What'll you drink, Mr. Gargery? Any relation?" To the last question.

"Well," said Joe, "to tell you the truth, I am's much in the habit of drinking at my body's expense but my own."

"Habit! Joe," retorted the stranger, "but once and away, and on a Saturday night too. Come! Put a name to it, Mr. Gargery."

"I wouldn't wish to be stiff company," said Joe. "Rum."

"Rum," repeated the stranger. "And will the other gentleman originate a sentiment?"

"Rum," said Mr. Wopsle.

"Three Rums, then!" cried the stranger, calling to the landlord. "Glasses round!"

"I wish other gentlemen to pay for Joe, by way of introducing Mr. Wopsle, "is a gentleman that you would like to hear give it out. Our clerk at church."

"Ah!" said the stranger, quickly, and cocking his eye at me. "The deuce! Young one, too! Out on the marshes, with the graves and the dead?"

"That's it," said Joe.

The stranger, with a comfortable kind of grunt over his pipe, put his legs up on the settle that he had all to himself. He wore a flapping broad-brimmed low hat, and, as he turned it a handkerchief tied over his head in the manner of a cap; so that he showed no hair. As he looked at the fire, I thought I saw a cunning expression, followed by a half laugh, come into his face.

"I am not acquainted with this country, gentlemen, but it seems a solitary country toward the river."

"Most marshes is solitary," said Joe.

"No doubt, no doubt. Do you find any guinea sow, or range, or vagrants of any sort out on those lowlands?"

"Why, no, sir," said Joe, "none but a runaway convict now and then. And we don't find them very. Eh, Mr. Wopsle?"

Mr. Wopsle, with a majestic remembrance of old discomfiture, assented, but very sparingly.

"Seems you have been out after such?" asked the stranger.

"Once," returned Joe. "Not that we wanted to take them, you understand; we were not as lookers-on; me, and Mr. Wopsle, and Pip. Didn't us, Pip?"

"Yes, Joe."

The stranger looked at me again—still cocking his eye, as if he were expressly taking aim at me with his invisible gun, and said, "He's a likely young parcel of bones that. What is it you call him?"

"Pip," said Joe.

"Christened Pip?"

"No, not christened Pip."

"Surname Pip?"

"No," said Joe, "it's a kind of a family name what he gave himself when a infant, and is called by."

"Son of yours?"

"Well," said Joe, meditatively — not, of course, that it could be in anywise necessary to consider about it, but because it was the way at the Jolly Bargemen to seem to consider deeply about every thing that was discussed over pipes; "well—no, sir, he ain't."

"Nevvy?" said the strange man.

"Well," said Joe, with the same appearance of profound cogitation, "he is not—no, not to deceive you, he is not—my nevvy."

"What the devil relation, Mr. Gargery, do you keep company with?" asked the stranger. Which appeared to me to be an inquiry of unnecessary strength.

Mr. Wopsle struck in here that; as one who knew all about relationships, having professional occasion to be always mixed while females were in a man might not marry; and expounded the ties between me and Joe. Having his hand in, Mr. Wopsle introduced a most terrifically snarling passage from Richard the Third, and seemed to think he had done quite enough to account for the bodily decay of Joe in the pott say."

And by it may remark that when Mr. Wopsle referred to me, he considered it a necessary part of such reference to rumple my hair and look at it sideways. This, my fear suggested to my body of his standing who visited at our house should always have put me through the same intelligible action under similar circumstances. Yet I do not call to mind that I was ever in a condition of more helpless self-remark in our social family circle but some largeheaded person took these ophthalmic steps to patronize me.

All this while the stranger man looked at nobody but me, and looked at me as if he were determined to have a shot at me as soon as he bring me down. But he said nothing after offering his Blue Blazes observation until the glasses of rum-and-water were brought; and then he made his shot, and a most extraordinary one it was.

It was not a verbal remark, but a proceeding in dumb-show, and was pointedly addressed to me. He stirred his rum-and-water pointedly at me, and he tasted his rum-and-water pointedly at me. When he stirred it and he tasted it: not with a spoon that was brought to him, but with a file.

He did this so that nobody but I saw the file; and when he had done it he wiped the file and put it in a breast-pocket. I knew it to be Joe's file, and I began to be very uncomfortable the moment I saw the instrument. I sat gazing at him, pulled hard by the fascination of curiosity to settle, taking very little notice of me, and talking principally about turnips.

There was a delicious sense of cleaning-up and making a quiet pause before going on in life afresh, in our village on Saturday nights, which stimulated Joe to dare to stay out half an hour longer on Saturdays than at other times. The half-hour and the rum-and-water running out together, Joe got up to go, and took me by the hand.

"Stop half a moment, Mr. Gargery," said the strange man. "I think I've got a bright new shilling somewhere in my pocket, and if I have the boy shall have it."

Search resulted in out from a handful of small change, folded it in some crumpled paper, and gave it to me. "Yours!" said he. "Mind! your own."

I thanked him, staring at him far beyond the bounds of good manners, and looking tight to Joe. He gave Joe good-night, and he gave Mr. Wopsle good-night (who went out with us), and he gave me another look with his aiming eye—no, not a look, for he shut it up, but wonderfully seemed to dose me up by looking at me.

On the way home, if I had been in a humor for talking, the talk must have been all on my part, for Joe, Mr. Wopsle parted from us at the door of the Jolly Bargemen, and Joe went all the way home with his mouth wide open, to rinse the rum and water well down before bed-time. But I was in no manner stupefied by this turning up of my old convict and old acquaintance, and could think of nothing else.

My sister was not in a very bad temper when we presented ourselves in the kitchen, and Joe was encouraged by that unusual circumstance to tell her about the bright shilling. "A bad 'un, I'll be bound," said Joe, "or he wouldn't have given it to boy. Let's look at it."

I took it out of the paper, and it proved to be a good one. "But what's this?" said Mrs. Joe, observing Joe to be affecting and catching up the paper. "Two One-Pound notes?"

Nothing less than two fat sweltering one-pound notes could have been in store for the reception of the warmest intimacy with all the cattle-markets in the county. Joe caught up his hat again, and ran with them to the Jolly Bargemen, to restore them to their owner. While he was gone, I sat down on my usual stool and looked vacantly at my sister, feeling pretty sure that the man would not be there.

Joe returned with information of saying that the man was gone, but that he, Joe, had left word at the Three Jolly Bargemen concerning the notes. Then my sister sealed them up in a piece of paper, and put them under some dried rose-leaves in a tea-cannister that had belonged to a great-aunt in the state parlor. There they remained, a nightmare to me, many and many a night and day.

I had sadly broken sleep when I got to bed, through thinking of the strong man taking aim at me with his invisible gun, and of the guiltily coarse and common thing it was to be on secret terms of confidence with convicts—a feature in my low career that I had previously forgotten. I was haunted by the file too. A dread possessed me that, somehow, it must expect it, the file would reappear. I cowed myself to sleep by thinking of Miss Havisham's, next Wednesday: all at once I gave a cry that made Joe start out of a door, without seeing why held it, and I screamed myself awake.

A DY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXX.

I GIVE the old man's story, as nearly as I can, the way he told it.

"There is a little village on the Lego of Garda, called Peschiera. My family had lived there for some generations. We had a little wine-shop, and though not a very pretentious one, it was the best in the place, and much frequented by the inhabitants. My father was in a comfortable way, while he lived; he was a pensioned Sydale of Caprini, and I myself once held that dignity. You may not know, perhaps, that the office of Sydale is the closest of the townshalk, and not nominated by the government. Still the crown has its influence in the election, and it is usual to see one of its own partisans in power, and, when a popular candidate does even succeed under their will, the government officials take good care to make his berth as uncomfortable as they can. These are small distinctions of which to tell you to follow, but they were our great ones; and we were as ardent and excited and eager about the choice of our chief local grandee as though he wielded royal power in a great state.

"When I obtained the epaulette, my great ambition was to tread in the footsteps of my father, old Gustave Gamerra, who had left behind him a popularity and a memory of popular rights, and who had never hated the very least privilege that pertained to his native village. I did my duties—and very strictly, perhaps—for the sake, but I held my head high against all impositions, and was ready to fight with any man who felt that there was at least one popular institution in the land that no exercise of tyranny could touch. I was conscious about all our rights. I raked up out of old archives traces of privileges that we once possessed and had never yielded, and though I discovered concessions that had been made to us of which we had never enjoyed the profits, I was, so to say, ever at war with the authorities, who were frank enough to say, that when my two years of office expired, they meant to give me none wholesome lessons about obedience.

"They were as good as their word. I had no sooner descended to a private station than I was made to feel all the severities of their displeasure. They took away my license to sell salt and tobacco, and thereby fully one half of my little income; they tried to withdraw my privilege to sell wine, but this came from the municipality, and they could not touch it. Upon information that they had suborned they twice visited my house to search for seditious papers, and finally, they made me undergo a mode of their enmity that the timid of my townsfolk were afraid to be seen with me, and gradually dropped my acquaintance. This preyed upon me most of all. I was all my life of a social habit; I delighted to have my friends around me, or to go and visit them, and to find myself, as I was growing old, growing friendless too, was a great blow.

"I was a widower, and had none but an only daughter."

When he had reached thus far his voice failed him, and, after an effort or two, he could not continue, and turned away to the wall and buried it in his hands. Full ten minutes elapsed before he resumed, which he did with a hard, hollow tone, as though resolved to be encountered by his emotion.

"The troubles that so sadly severe all through the Italian Tyrol; it swept from Venice to Milan, and never missed even the mountain villages, far away into the Alps. At such times I would we lost one hundred and eighteen souls, and my Gretchen was one of them.

"We had grown to be very hard-hearted to each other; misfortune was at each man's door, and he had no heart to spare for a neighbor's grief; and yet such was the sorrow for that they came, in all this suffering and desolation, to try and comfort and keep up each other, though it was a time when all such cares were forgotten, the young people went and laid fresh flowers over her poor grave every morning. That was very kind of them, and made me weep heartily, and, in return, I heard always that a girl to feel that God knew what was best for all of us, and that mayhap he had taken her away to spare her some sorrow heavier than all we see to learn that I should pray to go to her. She had only been in the earth eight days, and I was left standing in my solitary house for I could not bear to open the shop, and began to think that I never have the courage to do so again, but would go away and try some other place and some other means of livelihood. It was while I was making thus a resolve Lenck came to the door, and I arose, rather angrily, to answer it.

"It was a sergeant of an infantry regiment, whose detachment was on march for Peschiera: there were quartered down there a few years since a battalion of three regiments in all haste from Vienna to suppress them. The sergeant was a Bohemian, and the regiment the Kinsky. He was a rough, coarse fellow, very full of his authority, disposing all villagers, and holding Italians in especial contempt. He came to order me to prepare rations and room for six soldiers, and desire to arrive at quarters. I answered, bodily, that I would not. I had served the office of syndic in the town, and was thus forever exempt from the billet; and I led him into my little sitting-room and showed him my 'brevet,' framed and glazed, over the chimney. He laughed heartily at my remonstrances, coolly turned the brevet with its face to the wall, and said,

"'If you don't want twelve of us instead of six you'll keep your tongue quiet, and give us a stoup of wine and a flask of wine.'

"I did not wait to answer him, but seized my hat and hurried away to the Place Commandant. He was at the country at that, but I could not help it; his was the only authority I could appeal to, and he was bound to do me justice. When I reached the bureau it was so crowded with soldiers and townsfolk, some seeking billets, some come to complain of the billet to be free, that I could not get past the door, and, after an hour's waiting, I was fain to give up altogether, and turned back home, where I had determined to make my statement in writing, which, after all, might have been the most fitting.

"I found my doors wide open when I got there, and a noisy crowd-soldiers and boys, who, either seated on the counter or squatting on their knapsacks, had helped themselves freely to my wine, and were raising the roof to the old cask, and drinking it in large cups from the barrel, which they handled liberally to their comrades as they passed.

"My heart was too full to care much for the loss, though I could remark that the boys, and, pushing my way through, I gained the inner room to find the fellow had taken the bed as his dormer and confusion. The old musket my father had carried for many a year, and which had long over the chimney in a hero-frame, lay smashed in fragments on the floor; some wanton fellow had run his bayonet through my breast, and was trying to get it out, and amuse as a banner; and one, he was a corporal, had taken down the whole wreath of roses that lay on Gretchen's coffin till it was laid in the earth, and placed it on his head. When I saw this I could bear no more; I grew as black, and dashed both my hands in his face. I tried to strangle him; I would have torn him with my teeth had they not dragged me off and beaten me on the ground, where they trampled on me and beat me, and then carried me away to prison.

"I was four days in prison before I was brought up for examination. I did not know whether it had been four or forty, for my senses had left me and I was mad; perhaps it was the cold dark cell and the silence restored me, but I came out calm and collected. I remembered every thing to the smallest incident.

"The soldiers were heard first; they agreed in every thing, and their story had all the air of truth about it. They owned they had taken my wine, but said that the regiment was ready and willing to pay for it as soon as I came back, and that all the rest they had done were only the usual follies of troops on a march. I began to claiming my exemption as a syndic, but was stopped at once by being told that my claim had never been submitted to the authorities, and that in my outrage on the imperial force I had forfeited all consideration on that score. My offense was easily proven. I did not deny it, and I was lectured for nigh an hour on the enormity of my crime, and then sentenced to pay a fine of a thousand zwanzigers to the emperor, and to receive four-and-twenty lashes with the rattan. "I should have been eight-and-forty but for my age," he said.

"On the same stool where I sat to hear my sentence was a circus man, waiting the Platz Commandant's leave to give some representations in the theatre. I knew him by this time, but had never spoken to him nor he to me; just, however, as the consultation had terminated, the words of condemnation he turned to look at me: maybap to see how I bore up under my misfortune. I saw him glance, and I dug my toes to sustain it. I wanted to bare myself manfully throughout, and not to let any one know that my heart was sinking, which I felt it was. The struggle was, perhaps, more than I was able for, and, while the tears pushed out and down upon my cheeks, I burst out laughing, and laughed away fit after fit, making the most terrible faces all the while; so outrageously comical was the convulsion that every one around laughed too, and there was the whole court screaming madly with the man in chains, and unable to control it.

"'Take the fool away!' cried the commandant at last, 'and let him have his punishment, school-fool!' And they carried me off, and I was flogged.

"It was about a week after I was down near Comacchio, that I knew how I got there. I was in rags and had no money, and the circus people came past on their way to Ferrara. I met a fellow that lately killed us with his droll face,' said the chief. 'I'll give you two zwanzigers a day, my man, if you'll only give us a face like that every evening. Is it a bargain?'

"I laughed. I could not keep now from laughing at anything, and the bargain was made, and I was a clown from that hour. They taught me a few easy tricks to help me in my trade, but it is my face that they care for—none can see it unmoved.

"He turned away as he spoke with a fearful contortion of countenance, but, moved by his story, and full only of what I had been listening to, I turned to pray and to weep.

"'Yes,' said he, meditatively, 'many a happy heart is kindled in the fire that is consuming another. As for myself, both joy and sorrow are dead within me. I am without hope, and, stranger still, without fear.'

"'But you are not without benevolence,' said I, as I looked toward the sleeping girl.

"She was like Gretchen,' he said he; and he bent down his head and sobbed bitterly.

"I was touched to the heart to witness what her if I dared; but I felt so subdued by the sorrow of the old man that my curiosity seemed almost unfeeling.

"'She came among us a mere child,' said he, 'and speedily attached herself to me. I contrived to learn enough of her dialect to understand and talk to her, and at last she began to regard me as a father, and even called me so. It was a long, long time before I could bear this. Every time I heard the word my grief would burst out afresh; but what could I do? I had to have come to like it now.'

"'And a kind, good, and gentle, and affectionate?' asked I.

"She is far too good and true-hearted to be in such company as ours. Would that such rich person—it should be a lady—kind, and gentle, and compassionate, could see her and take her away from such associations! It is a life of shame, ere it be too late! If I have a sorrow left me now, it is for her.'

I was silent; for though he wish only seemed fair and natural enough on his part, I could not help thinking it was somewhat selfish and unkind would prove.

"She would well repay it all," said he. "If ever there was a nature rich in great gifts, it is her. She can learn whatever she will, and for a word of encouragement would build a world on the fire for you. Hush!" whispered he, "she is stirring. What is it, darling?" said he, creeping close to her as she, throwing her arms, sat sleepily open, but not removing the handkerchief from her face.

She muttered something hurriedly, and then burst into a laugh so joyous and so catching, it was impossible to refrain from joining in it.

She threw back the kerchief at once and started to her knees, gazing steadfastly, almost sternly, at me. I saw that the old man had prehended the inquiry of her glance, and as quickly whispered a few words in her ear. She listened till he had done, and then springing toward me, she caught my hand and kissed it.

I suspect he must have rubbed some color of her movement, for she hung her head despondingly, and turned away from us both.

"Now for the road once more," said Victor-ello, "for if we stay much longer here we shall have the fierce flies, which are always worse toward evening."

It was not without great difficulty I could prevent his carrying my knapsack for me, and when the girl herself would gladly have borne some of my load. At last, however, we set forth, Tintenfleck lighting the way with a merry cantenette, that had the time of a quick step.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, December 17, in the Senate, the resolution introduced by Senator Clarke, asking the President for information relative to the condition of the fortifications in Charleston harbor, and copies of all correspondence upon the subject, was taken up, and objected to by Senator Green, and laid over. The bill to prevent the intercourse between the United States and Mexico was then taken up and discussed. The bill to authorize the use of Powell on the condition of the Union was taken up, and Senators Wade, Chandler, Hale, Simmons, and Trumbull, in favor of the bill, and Senators Saulsbury and Bayard, against it. Mr. Trumbull said that the present was a time for peacemakers, as they have not been for years. Compromises would now be entered into in the spirit of conciliation, and he could not understand why the Senate should not proceed to the consideration of the bill. The bill was then unanimously passed, and the Senate adjourned.

In the House, a resolution was introduced by Mr. Stanton, of Ohio, who wished to include all love of a meddling nature in the 31st year, 25th Congress, 2d Session, instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill for the purpose of declaring to vote, on the ground that they had been elected by a majority of the people of their hands. Mr. Lovejoy, of Illinois, then proposed a substitute for the resolution, consisting of all of nullification laws, which was agreed to. Mr. Lovejoy, of Illinois, then moved the previous question, which was similarly referred, as did also Mr. Adrain, of Kentucky. Mr. Stanton, of Ohio, moved to amend the resolution pledging the members to support the Union, and it was agreed to. Mr. Curry, of Georgia, offered a resolution declaring, among other things, that the Constitution recognizes property in slaves, and pending its consideration the House adjourned, after accepting invitations to dine with the President, and to attend the Committee of Thirty-three.

On Tuesday, in the Senate, the resolution of Senator Powell, of Kentucky, providing for the appointment of a Select Committee of thirteen, to report if any of the Union was passed, and the presiding officer was authorized to select the Committee. Mr. Crittenden, to-day, introduced a proposition for the settlement of the pending difficulties, similar to that of Mr. Crittenden of Georgia. It determine what shall be asked of the North, to be followed by a Convention of the States, and a motion for consultation and definite action; referred to the Select Committee. Senator Hunter introduced a joint resolution, a proposition, which is intended practically to re-establish the Missouri Compromise line. Senator Douglas said he shall not interfere with slavery where it already exist, but providing for the organization of the Territory of New Mexico, into Territories receiving to affairs in those Territories, where appropriate. Senator Wade, of Ohio, fard, of Georgia, called up the resolution introduced by him on Monday, in relation to the Constitution. But the Constitution recognize property in slaves. Mr. Sherman moved to lay it on the table, which was unanimously agreed to. Mr. Sherman then introduced that a direct vote should be taken on it. Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, then introduced a bill to tax title it, but finally did by a vote of 83 against 74. The House then took up the Tariff bill, and after being decided that it must go to the Committee of the Whole, and after a motion to lay it on the table was voted down, a motion to refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means. The House proceeding to reconsider his entered the Speaker Congress, and after the transaction of business, after into operation, as the reduced prices were not remunerative.

On Wednesday, 19th, in the Senate, Senator Johnson, of Tennessee, moved that the Senate do not adjourn, declared that Tennessee would stand by it to the last. Adjourn to the consideration of the Crittenden resolution. Until the other Southern States to follow her in her scheme of secession, he said that Tennessee would not be dragged into it. Southern or any other Candidate until she had time to consider them. Mr. Toombs, of Georgia, made a speech. Mr. Morgan Senator Toombs, of Georgia, made his appearance in the Senate for the first time since the late session. The Pension and the Military Academy bills were passed. Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, introduced a report in the consideration of the Deficiency Appropriation Bill, the House of Representatives to appropriation of $900,000 for the return and maintenance of the recaptured Africans. The bill has been reported from the Committee of Ways and Means. An effort was made to obtain its consideration, but it failed by a vote of 82 to 83.

On Thursday, 20th, in the Senate, the Tariff Bill was reported from the Committee of Ways and Means. Senator Hunter, of Virginia, offered a recommendation that its consideration be postponed to the first day of the next session called. Senator Clark, of New Hampshire, moved to take up the resolution of inquiry relative to the condition of the fortifications in Charleston Harbor, but the objection was made that it would not be in order to consider the subject, which was to be avoided at the present time. During the discussion, the question of the reception of the message coming up, Senator Trumbull, of Illinois, said he did not know of any fortifications in the harbor of Charleston that intended to declare war against a State, or to coerce a State, the Government. Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, said he spoken individuals. The Deficiency Bill, from the House, was referred to the Committee of Finance. Mr. Thomson, of Senator Johnson, of Tennessee, was then taken up. Mr. Bigler, of Pennsylvania, moved that the Committee be made a reporter to his colleague, Senator Wade. In the House, Mr. Stanton, of Tennessee, offered a resolution of inquiry relative to the suggestion of Mr. Miles, in the South Carolina Convention, that the Tariff Bill be so that that's threat had been made to the President regarding any attempt to reinforce the forts in the harbor.

The resolution, which created considerable excitement among the members, was referred to the Committee of the Tariff Bill. A report was made from the Judiciary Committee on the Wheeler impeachment case, recommending that the case be postponed until Thursday next. On Friday, 21st, in the Senate, Mr. Hunter, from the bill granting lands to the Kansas & Neosho Valley Railroad Co., reported back as an amendment the Pacific Railroad Bill reported by the Select Committee. Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, from the bill reported by a substitute offered by Mr. Cattle, of Iowa, which was agreed to. Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, finally adopted by the Committee and by the House, after various preferred substitutes, and the bill was laid on the table.

THE SECESSION CONVENTION IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

The Secession Convention of South Carolina assembled at 12½ at Columbia, and, after the preliminary organization of the body, nothing was done in regard to the subject which they called together to consider. The Governor's message of small-pox at Columbia the Convention adjourned to Charleston.

The delegates arrived at Charleston on 18th, and were received with a salute of 100 guns. The Convention met an hour o'clock, and proceeded to business. Nothing, however, of importance transpired beyond the appointment of committees, and the offering of a resolution to ascertain what property the United States claims the ownership of in South Carolina, how it was acquired, and whether the same was purchased for the erection of forts, magazines, or other uses. The resolution also calls for information as to the value of such other property as the United States may possess, and the value of the dues to which South Carolina would be entitled on an equitable division. A document purporting to be the Ordinance of the Act of the Georgia Legislature was laid on the table.

On Thursday, 20th, South Carolina, by solemn ordinance, declared her connection with the Confederacy of the United States dissolved. The instrument by which this act was communicated declares that the ordinance adopted by the people of South Carolina in the year 1788, assenting to the ratification of the United States was ratified, and all laws and parts of laws of the United States of the State repugnant thereto of the Constitution, are repealed, and that union subsisting between South Carolina and the other States, under the name of the United States of America, is at an end. The ordinance was engrossed on parchment, and the members of the Convention signed it at 6½ o'clock the evening. Commissioners will be sent from the State to announce effect of this action on business and other relations; on the collection of duties; on the taxation by the Federal Government; on the distribution of mail matter, etc.; but on definite action will be communicated by any one as to what was necessary or proper to be done.

ELECTION OF A GOVERNOR OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

The Legislature of South Carolina has assembled, after seven ballots, in electing a Governor, Colonel Pickens being the successful candidate. This election may be regarded as somewhat significant, inasmuch as Colonel Pickens is a Union man, and has been known for his views so much so moderate in his principles.

THE SOUTHERN CO-OPERATION.

Late reports from Georgia, received in Washington, indicate that the Legislature of that State will be fully prepared in her capacities that the Empire State of the South, and that she will, under all circumstances, to the end of following immediately in her footsteps, should she secede from the Confederacy with the Union of States. There is asserted to be a large party of Unionists in Georgia, but they are powerless with those opposed to separate state action to defeat the extremists, and thus offset delay. Governor Brown, of Georgia, it is said, has already created a better feeling in Washington, and a strong hope that, through his influence with the Consulting Committee, something might yet be done to stay the tide of dissension.

THE LEGISLATURE OF MISSISSIPPI.

The following message from the Governor of the Mississippi Legislature, in called session to consider the measures for defense:

The bill for a State Convention, as we have before stated, passed the House unanimously, and is now in the Senate. The election of delegates is to take place the 19th of December, and the Convention to meet on the 7th.

The following resolutions have become law:

Resolved, That this State cannot be requested to appeal as many commissioners as in his judgment may be necessary to the Slaveholding States of the South, to represent the State or States to which such commissioner shall be appointed, whenever in his judgment it shall be deemed that this Legislature has geared an act calling a convention or legislature of the Slaveholding States, to consider the present relations of the Northern and Southern sections of the country, and to devise such remedies as may be necessary to secure the rights and principles of liberty to the States of the South, and to the people thereof, and to provide for the future safety and security of the Slaveholding States, and adopting of efficient measures for their common defense and safety.

Resolved, That the people of Southern State not have conveyed its Legislature, the commissioner to such State Convention, or Legislature, as may be called by the States together, in order that its co-operation be immediately secured."

MANIFESTO FROM TUSCON.

An important manifesto has just been issued by Senator Toombs, in the shape of a letter in reference to the fifth article of the Constitution. It says that if the Constitution should be amended so that its provisions could not be altered by the Legislature of the States, or by Congress, or a majority of the States, in Congress, will vote for the admission of Kansas, which would be only necessary and fair to postpone final action in the Southern States and Congress until the Legislature of the States be called together for action upon the Personal Liberty bills. Should the Legislature of Georgia, therefore, then he would think it proper for Georgia to recede, as the latest by the 4th of March.

THE NEW YORK DELEGATION FOR THE UNION.

The New York delegation held an adjourned caucus on Friday, the 21st, at the Astor House, to consider the state of affairs. After considerable discussion, which lasted from 8 to 12 o'clock, the delegation unanimously agreed to stand by the Constitution, and the laws must be maintained in all their force, and by the Union must be preserved.

THE COMMITTEE OF THIRTY-THREE.

The following resolution of Winter Davis has passed the Committee of Thirty-three by a vote of 17 to 14:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c. That the people of the United States have a right to their statutes to be revived, with a view to ascertain if any of them have been repealed by the acts of Congress below the execution of the laws of the United State, made in pursuance of the fifth article of the Constitution of the United States for the delivery up of persons escaping from the service of their masters, and requiring the States; and the Senate and House of Representatives earnestly recommend to the Legislatures of the several States to repeal all such laws as have been passed by it, in fulfillment of their constitutional obligations, and by a due regard for the peace of the country, and the preservation of the Union, and are requested to commemorate these resolutions to the Governors of the several States, with a request that they will lay the same before the Legislatures thereof."

NEGRO INSURRECTIONS IN ALABAMA.

We read in the Montgomery (Alabama) Advertiser of December 17:

"We have received a terrible scare at a late hour yesterday evening, that an insurrectionary plot had been discovered among the negroes somewhere between Dublin and Pine Level, in the county, and the evidence against the negroes implicated was so strong as to leave no room to doubting that the citizens of that vicinity have determined to hang them. We have not the names of those belonging to Mr. Allen and Mr. Pearce. The greatest excitement prevailed in the vicinity of the outrages, and further particulars. We received this morning, says the Mobile Register, from Pine Level, in Montgomery County. It will serve to put the people every where on their guard, and to induce them to take all the necessary precautions against every plot of the kind. Another letter, from Dublin, will be shipped in the bud, as it has no doubt been hatched all in this county.

December 21, 1860.

"We have received a deep-laid plot among the negroes of our neighborhood, and from what we can find out from reliable sources, it is general over the country. The plot is this, they are to make a general fire during the Christmas holidays. They have now implicated about seven or ten among them as they came. We hear some starting facts. They look for aid from the free negro to divide out pistols, mules, lands, and household furniture. Their plan is this: They are to fire the houses on Christmas night (that they live with), and then get together and take the country. They look for aid from Lincoln and the Northern people. We can not find out the exact time, but they have been heard to say Christmas night, the 25th of December. No hanging in this. You may publish this, but don't say we gave you cause, and request the other papers to do the same.

VIOLENCE IN MISSISSIPPI.

We read in the Memphis (Tenn.) Argus:

"FRIARS POINT, MISS., Dec. 11, 1860.

"ERITOR ARGUS,—There is great excitement in this community. The people are in arms against the Northern men who have been in this country but a few months. On yesterday evening two gins and a steam cotton were fired simultaneously, doubtless by the procurement of these scoundrels. The people are up to put a stop to it, and Vigilance Committee were soon under arms, and proceeded to the room of three suspicious men by the name of Hamilton, the others unknown, and took them and hung them in the first tree, and immediately cut them down and buried them. The town is now under arms, the military are standing by the cannon, and all is quiet at 12 o'clock. This morning the remainder of the Northern men were taken up the river on the steamboat Fontaine, some of them were handed with the letters G. B. (gin-burners) before them. Fourteen gins have been burned in this country during the last six weeks, and the people have determined to stop it.

"All the steamboats were hailed, hurried up, and ordered to stop at this point last week, and it is generally believed that the last gin fired by the Yankees implicated the man who were hung. He said that they had sold him a gin, and when he went to get it he found when Lincoln was President, and that there will be a general hanging of the negroes then.

"The Vigilance Committee have sworn to hang every man who is found burning gins, and will be up here all such and better be in — than Friar's Point.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S LETTER OF THANKS TO THE PRESIDENT.

Lord Lyons has communicated to the Department of State the expression of the feelings of her Majesty Queen Victoria relative to the hospitable reception by the Prince of Wales in his recent tour through the United States. The expression highly appreciates the kindness and courtesy shown him by our citizens, and expresses the most profound sense of obligation.

BRITISH OPINION ON THE SECESSION QUARREL.

The London Times, in the course of an article on the Secession question, says: "Understanding as we do perfectly to a question to say that it is only one of feeling, and will fail to the people of the two countries to be very unkind. The feelings which now divide the United States into antagonistic for a time later than those which the languages and races are themselves force which can not be resisted by war, and they have an irresistible tendency in the principle of slavery; they must tend to tighten the grasp of the Union rather than to relax it. On one hand, only, is to provoke the fanaticism and the ingenuity of the Abolitionist, and on the other hand to call forth the best of the people and still more unscrupulous efforts for the rescue and emancipation of the slave. The whole question of the Southern States involves personal appreciation and deference. It is very difficult for the North to feel what it may be met with reason. As the Southern States certainly would not stand in any danger by a separation, the Northern States can do nothing, and have done nothing, to estimate the value of the Union to the Southern Confederacy. all that can be done it to take a moderate and rational view of the case.

"Can not all the partners in this business put their heads together, and bend over the account, and discover what can be done to mitigate what is in its difficult to shirk? Perhaps it may be quick to the last! Let any sign be better than dividing State against State, house against house, and servants against servants in a hurried and bloody war in the world."

THE EMPRESS EUGENIA AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

The Empress Eugenia visited her Majesty on the 4th inst., at Windsor Castle. The Prince Consort received the Empress at the railway station. The Empress came on the left the station, and along the whole line of route, was loudly cheered by the people. The Queen, the Prince of Wales, Princess Alice and Prince Alfred, attended by the ladies and gentlemen in waiting, received the Empress at the entrance. The Empress looked her freshest and was received. The Duke of Cambridge, Princess Louis of Hesse, and Princess Mary of Cambridge, with the Royal Household mansion were present. The Empress remained to partake of luncheon with her Majesty. The Duchess of Kent and the Prince and Princess of Leiningen arrived from Frogmore at about 3 o'clock. At 4 o'clock the Queen, the Empress took leave of the Queen, and returned to London. The Prince Consort accompanied the Empress to Windsor station. On her return the Empress appeared to be in good health, but not in good spirits.

THE NEW TRANSATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

The reports of the North Atlantic Telegraph expedition crank out here every day by the British newspapers and promoters of the project for carrying a line of telegraph from Europe to America. Meanwhile, the work is progressed, not proving favorable. The ocean line selected was ascertained to be the best for the purpose, and the machinery is a telegraph cable, and it was found that the coast of Greenland offered obstacles which precluded the successful landing of a cable being interfered with by ice or icebergs, which have been frequently met with by obstacle of the Greenland route.

FRANCE.

REFORMS IN FRANCE.

The Times correspondent writes: "The 24 December, the day that Real Louis Napoleon's destiny for good or evil, passed away without a single event to chronicle its passage. People confidently looked at the Moniteur, yesterday, and found in the place of decrees of the Senate some anticipating a decree liberating the Press, others announcing the Corps Legislatif as consulting the constitutional commissions, others anticipated the abolition of the passport system, and others the reduction of the Imperial Guard. Corps and the order for a new election. But none of these measures are yet decreed, and all must be postponed till the 1st of January. Even then there is no assurance that we shall have any of the liberal measures we anticipate. We hear from the Ministry of the interior that the question of the abolition of the passport system is undergoing examination; but we know that the Prefects of Police oppose the abolition of the passport system, declaring that the administrators of justice of every clue can be brought to a conclusion, and to extend a clause to the passport system. With the routine and the complicated organization of the police system, the passport system will remain in force for years, and each Prefect will prefer that a successor be charged with the inconvenience.

AN AMERICAN CORPS TO VISIT PARIS.

The Paris correspondent of the Post says, states that a military corps of the United States intend to visit Paris in the spring. The commandant of the Seventh Royal Lombard battalion having communicated to the American Minister at Paris the order of the day issued by the Emperor of the French Empire, a correspondence has taken place on the subject between the Minister and the Emperor. The result of which is that the Emperor has granted to the Americans the privilege of visiting Paris as a body, and in military uniform.

ITALY

PROGRESS OF THE WAR.

At latest date the siege of Gaeta continued; but it was reported that the fire of the besiegers had slackened. The Sardinian batteries were in the Fortress. The garrison replied to the fire, but made no sortie. Nothing important had occurred between the Papal and Sardinian troops. Count Lamoricière had arrived at Ancona on the 4th, and had immediately assumed the command of the Pontifical troops. The Sardinian fortresses of Peschiera, Mantua, and Verona were being provisioned and armed. The Austrian garrisons of the Venetian Quadrilateral. He had also stranded the officers in Venice, and told them to prepare for the eventualities of an energetic defense. There were rumors of increasing insurrectionary movements in Abruzzi. Important demonstrations in Naples and elsewhere were put down. It was reported that Napoleon had intimated to Francis I. the inability of further resistance. There were vague rumors that Cardinal Antonelli had resigned. The official Austrian journal contradicts the rumors of negotiations for the cession of Venetia.

Accompanists, Bugenots, and some other towns in the province of Naples had been reoccupied by the Piedmontese. The Archbishop of Naples has left Rome, having been invited to return to Naples.

CHRISTMAS CHIMES AT TRINITY CHURCH, NEW YORK.

A MESSAGE SEA. FROM THE SEA.

Dickens's Christmas Story.

[Published from advance Proof-sheets purchased from the Author for "Harper's Weekly."]

CHAPTER I.—THE VILLAGE.

"AND a mighty sing'lar and pretty place it is, as ever I saw in all the days of my life!" said Captain Jorgan, looking up at it.

Captain Jorgan had to look high to look at it, for the village was built sheer up the face of a steep and lofty cliff. There was no road in it, there was no wheeled vehicle in it, there was not a level yard in it. From the seashore to the cliffs, top two hundred feet of white houses, placed opposite to one another, and twisting hers and there, and there and here, one, like the sides of a long succession of stages of crooked ladders, and you climbed up the village or climbed down the village by the staves between: some six feet wide or so, and made of sharp, irregular stones. The old pack-saddle, long laid aside in most parts of England as one of the appendages of its infancy, flourished here intact. Strings of pack-horses and pack-donkeys started slowly up the staves of the ladders, bearing fish, and coal, and such other cargo as was unshipping at the pier from the dancing fleet of village boats, and from two or three little coasting traders. As the boats of burden ascended ladder, or descended light, they got so lost at intervals in the floating clouds of village smoke, that they seemed to dive down some of the village chimneys and come to the surface again far off, high above others. No two houses in the village were alike, in chimney, size, shape, door, window, gable, features, any thing. The little low bow-fronted dwers were musical with water, running clear and bright. The staves were musical with the clattering feet of the pack-horses and pack-donkeys, and the voices of the fishermen ringing them up, mingled with the voices of the fishermen down at their many children. The pier was musical with the wash of the sea, the wheeling of gulls, and the cries of sailors, and the airy fluttering of little vanes and sails. The rough, sea-bleached boulders of which the pier was made, and the rich, dark boulders of the shore, were brown with drying nets. The red-brown cliffs, richly wooded to their extremest verge, had the prettiest and boldest wild form, reflected in the blusest water, under the clear North December sky, as if a November storm were a cloud. The village itself was so steeped in autumnal foliage, from the houses giving on the pier to the topmost cottage on the cliff against the sky, one might have fancied it was out a birds'-nesting, and was (as indeed it was) a wonderful climber. And mountains, hills, the place was full of them: some music from them too; for the rock was very busy on the higher levels, and the sea was full of flapping wings was fishing in the bay, and the lusty little robin was hopping among the great stone blocks and ring rings of the breakwater, and trifles in the faith of his ancestors and the Children in the Wood.

Then it came to pass that Captain Jorgan, sitting balancing himself on the pier-wall, struck his leg with his open hand, as some men do when they are pleased—and as he always did when he was pleased—and said,

"A mighty sing'lar and pretty place it is, as ever I saw in all the days of my life!"

Captain Jorgan had not been through the village, but had come down to the pier by a winding-sida-road, to have a preliminary look at it from the level of his own natural element. He had seen many things and places, and had stowed them all away in a shrewd intellect and a vigorous memory. He was an American sailor, was Captain Jorgan—a New Englander—but he was a citizen of the world, and a combination of most of the best qualities of most of its best countries.

For Captain Jorgan to sit any where in his long-skirted blue coat and blue trowsers, without being observed, was a thing that could only happen when he could converse with every body within speaking distance, was a sheer impossibility. So the captain fell to talking with the fishermen, and to asking them knowing questions about the fishery, and the tides, and the currents, and the reef of rocks at that point yonder, and what you kept in your eye, and got into a line with what else when you ran into the little harbor; and other nautical problems, and trifles. Among the men who exchanged ideas with the captain was a young fellow who exactly hit his fancy—a young fisherman of two or three-and-twenty, in the rough sea-dress of his craft, with a brown face, dark curling hair, and bright, modest eyes under his Sou'wester hat, and with a frank but simple and retiring manner, which the captain found uncommonly taking. "I'll give you three dollars," said the captain to himself, "that your father was a honest man!"

"Might you be married now?" asked the captain, when he had had some talk with this new acquaintance.

"Not yet."

"Going to be?" said the captain.

"I hope so."

The captain's keen glance followed the slightest possible turn of the dark eye, and the slightest possible tilt of the Sou'wester hat. The captain then slapped both his legs, and said to himself,

"Never knew such a good thing in all my life! Here's his sweet-heart looking over the wall!"

There was a very pretty girl looking over the wall, from a little platform of cottage, vine, and fuchsia; and she certainly did not look as if the presence of this young fisherman in the landscape made it any the less sunny and hopeful for her.

Captain Jorgan, having doubled himself up to laugh with that hearty good nature which is quite exultant in the innocent happiness of other people, had undoubled himself, and was going to start a new subject, when there appeared coming down the lower ladders of stones a man whom he hailed as "Tom Pettifer Ho!" Tom Pettifer Ho responded with alacrity, and in speedy course descended on the pier.

"Afraid of a sun-stroke in England in November, Tom, that you wear your tropical hat, strongly paid outside and paper-lined inside, here?" said the captain, eying it.

"It's a rail to be on the safe side, sir," replied Tom.

"Safe side!" repeated the captain, laughing. "You'd guard against a sun-stroke, with that old hat, in an Ice Pack. Wal'! What have you made out at the Post-office?"

"It is the Post-office, sir."

"What's the Post-office?" said the captain.

"The name, sir. The name keeps the Post-office."

"A coincidence!" said the captain. "A lucky hit! Show me where it is. Good-by, shipmates, for the present! I shall come and have another look at you, I dare say, this afternoon."

This was addressed to all there, but especially the young fisherman; so all there acknowledged it, but especially the young fisherman. "He's a sailor!" said one to another, as they looked after the captain's strong figure. That he was; and so outpeaking was the sailor in him, that although his dress had nothing nautical about it, with the single exception of the tarry hat, and was that of a shore-going shape and form, too long in the sleeves and too short in the legs, and too unaccommodatingly tight in the seat, besides carrying in a pair of Wellington boots, and surmounted by a tall, stiff hat which was certainly never worn at sea in any wind under Heaven; nevertheless, a glimpse of his sagacious, weather-beaten face, or his strong, powerful figure, there established the captain's calling. Whereas Mr. Pettifer—a man of a certain plump neatness, with a curly head of hair, a curly mouth, curly in a jacket and shoes and all things correspondent—looked no more like a sea-captain than Captain Jorgan, that he looked like a sea-serpent.

The two climbed high up the village—which was the most arbitrary village that twists in it, so that the colder's house came dead across the ladder, and the baker's house came dead across most have gone through his house, and through him too, as he sat at his work between two little windows, with oats on the microscopic—by geological formation of that part of Devonshire, and the other telescopically on the open sea—but two climbed high up the village, and came to stop on the ladder of stones, a pulbished little window of a single pane of glass: peeping out of an abutting corner of the sun-lighted shop, and looking at its bright-ness.

"How do you do, ma'am?" said the captain. "I am very glad to see you. I have come a long way to see you."

"How so, sir? Then I am sure I am very glad to see you, though I don't know you from Adam."

Thus a comely elderly woman, short of stature, plump of form, sparkling and dark of eye, who, perfectly clean and neat herself, stood in the midst of her perfectly clean and neat arrangements, and surveyed Captain Jorgan with smiling curiosity.

"Ah! I am sure you are," said the captain, immediately, and with a slight movement of her hands, that was not very unlike wringing them; "then you are heartily welcome!"

"Thank'ee, ma'am," said the captain. "I don't know what it is, I am sure, that brings out the salt in me, but every body seems to see it on the crown of my hat and the cuffs of my coat. Yes, ma'am, I am in that way of life."

"And the other gentleman, too," said Mrs. Raybrock.

"Well now, ma'am," said the captain, glancing down at Tom, "that is a real gentleman, "you are that nigh right, that he goes to sea—if that makes him a sailor. To oblige a fine steward, ma'am, Tom Pettifer; he's been a'most all trades you could name, in the coorse of his life—would have bought all your chairs and tables, once, if you had wished to sell 'em—but now he's my steward. My name's Jorgan, and I'm a ship-owner, and I sail my own and my partners' ships, and have done so this five-and-twenty year. According to custom I am called Captain Jorgan, but I am no more a captain, bless your heart! than you are."

"Perhaps you'll come home to my parlor, sir, and take a chair?" said Mrs. Raybrock.

"Exactly what I was going to propose myself, ma'am. After you."

Thus replying, and rejoining Tom to give an eye to the ship, Captain Jorgan followed Mrs. Raybrock into the little low back-room—decorated with divers plants in pots, tea-trays, old china tea-pots, and punch-bowls—which was at once the private sitting-room of the Raybrock family and the inner cabinet of the post-office of the village of Steepways.

"Now, ma'am," said the captain, "it don't signify a cent to you where I was born, except—" But here the shadow of some one entering fell upon the captain's figure, and he broke off to double himself up, slap both his legs, and ejaculate, "Never knew such a thing in all my life! Here he is again! How are you?"

These words referred to the young fellow who had so taken Captain Jorgan's fancy down at the pier. To make it all quite complete he came in accompanied by the sweet-heart whom the captain had detected looking over the wall. A prettier sweet-heart the sun could not have shone upon that morning day. As she stood before the captain, with her rosy lips just parted in surprise, her brown eyes a little wider open than was usual from the same cause, and her breathing a little quickened by the ascent (and possibly by some mysterious hurry and flurry at the parlor door, in which the captain had observed her face to be for a moment partially eclipsed by her Sou'wester hat), she looked so charming, that the captain felt himself under a moral obligation to slap both his legs again. She was very simply dressed, with no other ornament than an autumnal flower in her bosom. She wore neither hat nor bonnet, but merely a scarf or kerchief, folded over her back over the head, to keep the sun off—according to a fashion that may be sometimes seen in the more genial parts of England as well as of Italy, and which is probably the first fashion of head-dress that came into the world when grapes and roses went out.

"In my country," said the captain, rising to give her his chair, and dexterously sliding it close to another chair, as she sat down, "the young fishermen must necessarily establish himself—" in my country we should establish beauty first-rate!"

Whenever a frank manner is offensive, it is because it is strained or feigned; for there may be such as much unbearable affectation in plainness as in mincing nicety. All that the captain said and did was honestly according to his nature, and his nature was so open and good nature, that therefore, when he paid this little compliment, and expressed with a sparkle or two of his knowing eye, "I see how it is, and nothing could be better," he had established a delicate confidence on that subject with the family.

"I was saying to your worthy mother," said the captain to the young man, after again introducing himself by name and occupation, "I was saying to your mother (and you're very like her) that it didn't signify where I was born, except that it was raised on question-asking ground, where the babies as soon as ever they come into the world, inquire of their mothers—Now, how old may you be, and what air you a goin' to name me?—which is a fact." Here he slapped his leg. "Such being the case, I may be excused for asking you if your name's Alfred?"

"Yes, sir, my name is Alfred," returned the young man.

"I am not a conjurer," pursued the captain, "and don't think me so, for I shall right soon undeceive you. Likewise don't think, if you please, though I did come from that country of the babies, that I am asking questions for question-asking's sake, for I am not. Somebody belonging to you is expected to arrive?"

"My elder brother Hugh," returned the young man. He said it in an altered and lower voice, and glanced at his mother: who raised her head hurriedly, and put them together across her black gown, and looked eagerly at the visitor.

"No! For God's sake, don't think that!" said the captain, in a solemn way; "I bring no good tidings of him."

There was a silence, and the mother turned her face to the fire and put her hand between it and her eyes. The young fisherman slightly motioned toward the window, and the captain, looking in that direction, saw the young widow sitting at a neighboring window across a little garden, engaged in needle-work, with a young child sleeping on her bosom. The captain considered until the captain asked of Alfred:

"How long is it since it happened?"

"He sailed for his last voyage better than three years ago."

THE WRITING FOUND IN THE BOTTLE.

"Ship struck upon some reef or rock, as I take it," said the captain, "and all hands lost?"

"Yes."

"Wal'!" said the captain, after a shorter silence. "Here I sit who may come to the same end, like enough. He holds the seas in the hollow of His hand. We must all strike somewhere and go down. Our comfort, then, for ourselves and one another, is, to have done our duty. I'll wager your brother did his?"

"He did!" answered the young fisherman. "If ever man strove faithfully on all occasions to do his duty, my brother did. My brother was not a quick man (any thing but that), but he was a faithful, true, and just man. We were the sons of only a small tradesman in this county, sir; yet our father was as watchful of his good name as if he had been a king."

"A precious sight more so, I hope—bearing in mind the general run of that class of critter," said the captain. "But I interrupt."

"My brother considered that our father left the good name to us, to keep clear and true."

"Your brother considered right," said the captain; "and you couldn't take care of a better legacy. But again I interrupt."

"No; for I have nothing more to say. We have been a Happy Family, and we loved one another, and we feel certain that he died well for the good name. And now it has come into my keeping. And that's all."

"Well spoken!" cried the captain. "Well spoken, young man! Concerning the manner of your brother's death—by this time the captain had released the hand he had shaken, and sat with his own broad forearm drawn hastily out on his knee, and spoke aside—"concerning the manner of your brother's death, it may be that I have some information to give you: though I may not be, for I am far from sure. Can we have a little talk alone?"

The young man rose; but not before the captain's quick eye had noticed that, on the pretty sweet-heart's turning to the window to greet the young widow with a nod and a wave of the hand, the young widow had held up to her the needlework on which she was engaged, with a patient and mournful smile. So the captain said, being on his legs:

"What might she be making now?"

"What is Margaret making, Kitty?" asked the young fisherman—with one of his arms apparently mislaid somewhere.

As Kitty only blushed in reply, the captain doubled himself up, so far as he could, standing, and said, with a side look at his leg:

"In my country we should call it weddin'-clothes. Fact! We should, I do assure you."

But it seemed to strike the captain in another light too; for his laugh was not a long one, and he added, in quite a grumbling tone:

"And it's very pretty, my dear, to see her—poor young thing, with her fatherless child upon her bosom—giving up her thoughts to your brother and your happiness. It's very pretty, my dear, and it's very good. May your marriage be more prosperous than hers, and be a comfort to her too. May the blessed sun see you all happy together, in possession of the good name, long after I have been plowing the great salt field that is never sown!"

Kitty answered very earnestly. "Oh! Thank you, sir, with all my heart!" And, in her loving little way, kissed her hand to him, and possibly put something in the young fisherman too, or the latter held the parlor door open for the captain to pass out.

CHAPTER II.—THE MONEY

"THE stairs are very narrow, sir," said Alfred Raybrock to Captain Jorgan.

"Like my cabin-stairs," returned the captain, "on many a voyage."

"And they are rather inconvenient for the head."

"If you'll take care to take care of your's this time, after all the knocking about the world it has had," replied the captain, as unconcernedly as if he had no connection with it, "it's not worth looking after."

Thus they came into the young fisherman's bedroom, which was as perfectly neat and clean as the ship and galley below: though it was but a little place, with a sliding window, and a phrenological ceiling expressive of all the peculiarities of the house-roof. Here the captain sat down on the foot of the bed, and, glancing at a dreadful libel on Kitty which ornamented the wall—the production of some wandering lunatic, whom the captain secretly admired, as having availed himself, from the fresh heads of ship—motioned to the young man to take the rush-chair on the other side of the small bed. Then, with his left hand, he again put his hand into the deep breast-pocket of his long-skirted blue coat, and took out of it a strong square case-bottle and a large bottle, but such as may be seen in any ordinary ship's medicine-chest. Setting the bottle on the table without removing his hand from it, Captain Jorgan then spake as follows:

"In my last voyage homeward-bound," said the captain, "and that's the voyage off of which I now cross straight, I encountered such weather off the Horn as it may very often be met with, even there, I have rounded that stormy Cape pretty often, and I believe I have been about close to the dividing storms that blew the devil's horns and tail off, and left to the horns being worked up into tooth-picks for the plantation overseers to use with, as they may be seen (if you travel down South, or away West, for enough) picking their teeth with 'em, while the whole stock of the tail, by reason of this last voyage, homeward-bound for Liverpool from Sydney, I have by me. Now, my young friend, it blew. Whole measures! No half measures, nor making believe to blow; it blew! Now I won't blow you the state of the wind into the sails —though I expected to be even that—but I was blown clean out of my course; and when the wind it fell calm, it fell dead calm, and a strong current set one way, day and night, night and day, and I drifted—drifted—drifted—out of all the regular tracks and courses of ships, and drifted yet, and yet drifted. It behooves a man who takes charge of fellow-creatures, as I have very often found to myself master of his calling. I never did rest, and consequently I never did well (specially looking over the side in the dead calm of that strong current) what dangers to expect, and what precautions to take against 'em. In fact, I never did driving head on to an Island. There was no Island in the chart, and, therefore, you may say it was ill manners in the Island to be there; but the dispute its had breeding, but there it was. Thanks be to Heaven, I was ready for the Island, and the Island was ready for me. I made it out myself from the masthead, and I got enough way upon her in good time to lay her off. So there it was to be lowered and manned, and went in that boat myself to explore the Island. There was a reef outside it, and a gap in a corner of it, where some water within the reef, was a heap of sea-weed, and entangled in that sea-weed was this bottle."

Here the captain took his hand from the bottle for a moment, that the young fisherman might direct a wistful look upon it, and then replaced his hand and went on:

"If ever you come—or even if ever you don't come—to a desert island, you—as you may call your spy-glass well; for the smallest thing you see may prove of service to you, and may give you information or some warning in it. That's the principle on which I came to see this bottle. I picked up the bottle, and ran the boat ashore on the Island and made fast and went ashore, armed, with a part of my boat's crew. We found that every scrap of vegetation on the Island (I, of course, is my opinion, but scant and scrubby at the best of times) had been consumed by fire. We set about making our way, cautiously and toilsomely, over the pulverized embers, one of my people sank into the earth, knee-deep. He turned round to laugh, for no one out smart, shipmates,' says he, 'for my feet are among bones.' We soon got him on his legs again, and then we dug round, according to the depth the man was right, and that his feet had been among bones. More than that, they were human bones; though whether the remains of one man, or of two or three men, what with calcination and ashes, and what with a poor practical knowledge of anatomy, I can't undertake to say. We examined the whole Island, and made out nothing else save and except that, from its opposite side, I sighted a considerable tract of land, which land I was able to make out according to the best judgment of which (not to trouble you with my log) I took a fresh departure. When I got aboard again, I opened the bottle, which was sealed down, as you see, and glass-stoppered as you see. Inside of it,' pursued the captain, shaking down into his words, 'I found this little crumpled folded paper, just as you see. Outside of it was written, as you see, these words: Whosoever finds this, and has it treated by the dead to convey it inverted to Alfred Baybrook, North Devon, England.' A sacred charge,' said the captain, concluding his narrative, 'and, Alfred Baybrook, there it is!"

This is my poor father's writing!"

"I supposed so." said Captain Jorgan. "I'll take a look out of this little window while you read it."

"Pray so, and I should be best so. We should all be hurt. My brother couldn't know it would fall into such hands as yours."

The captain sat down again on the foot of the bed, and the young man opened the folded paper with a trembling hand, and spread it on his knee. The ragged paper, evidently creased and torn both before and after being written on, was much blotted and stained, and the ink had faded and run, and many words were wanting. What the captain and the young fisherman made out together, after much re-reading and much humoring of the folds of the paper, is given on the preceding page.

The young fisherman had become more and more agitated, as the writing had become clearer to him. He now left it lying before the captain, over whose shoulder he had been reading it, and, dropping into his former seat, leaned forward on the table and laid his face in his hands.

"What, man," urged the captain, "don't give in! Be up and doing, like a man!"

"It is selfish, I know—but doing what, doing what?" cried the young fisherman, in complete despair, and stamping his foot hard on the ground.

"Doing what?" returned the captain. "Something! I'd go down to the little headwaiter below, yonder, and take a warrant at one of the sailsearched iron-rings there, and either wrench it up by the roots or—much my teeth out of my head, sooner than I'd do nothing. Nothing!" ejaculated the captain. "Any fool or fainthearted can do that, and nothing can be done without it. The ship's intended to be found out, I believe, by one of them Latin critters," said the captain, with the deepest derision; "as if Adam hadn't found it out, afore ever he so much as named the beasts!"

"And the question is, is it right to hold words that there was some greater reason than he yet understood for the young man's distress. And he put him with a sympathizing look.

"Come, cone" continued the captain. "Speak out. What is it, lad?"

"There was never beautiful she is, Sir," said the young man, looking up for the moment, with a shadow fear upon his face.

"Did any man ever say she warn't beautiful?" retorted the captain. "I'd go, and kick him."

The young man laughed faintly in spite of himself, and said, "It's not that, it's not that."

"Why, then, what is it?" said the captain, in a more soothing tone.

The young fisherman mournfully composed himself to tell the captain what he held in her hand, who was the first person he married next Monday week—"

"Were to have been!" interrupted Captain Jorgan. "And are to be? Hey?"

Young Baybrook shook his head, and traced out with his forefinger the words "poor father's five hundred pounds," in the written paper.

"Go down," said the captain. "Five hundred pounds? Yes?"

"That sum of money," pursued the young fisherman, entering with his quick doubt and wonder at his demonstration, while the captain eyed him with a hard earnestness, "is due to my father on his descent. When he died, he owed no man more than he left mean to pay, but he had been able to lay by only five hundred pounds."

"Five hundred pounds," repeated the captain "Yes?"

"In his lifetime, years before, he had expressly said the money, aside, to leave to my mother—like a settle upon her, if I make myself understood."

"Yes?"

"He had risked it once—my father put down a offering at that time, and gave me money—and was resolved never to risk it again."

"Not a spec'lator," said the captain. "My mother wouldn't have it. Good! Yes?"

"My mother has never touched the money till now. And now, when I am married next Monday week, in buying me a handsome share in our neighboring fishery here, to settle me in life with Kitty"—

The captain's face fell, and he passed and repassed his sun-browned right hand over his thin hair, in a disappointed manner.

"Kitty's father has no more than enough to live on, even as we speak, and has always lived above here. He is a kind of bailiff or steward of many rights here, and they are not much, and it is but a poor little office. I'm not ashamed to say so. Kitty must never marry to mere drudgery and hard living."

The captain still sat stroking his thin hair, and looking at the young fisherman.

"I am ashamed that my father had no knowledge that any one was wronged as to this money, or that any restitution ought to be made, as I am certain that he would have made it, when on the solemn warning from my brother's grave in the sea, that the money is Stolen Money," said Young Baybrook, forcing himself to the repetition of the words, "can I doubt it? Can I touch it?"

"About and touch, my lad," said the steady observer the captain; "but about not touching—no—I don't think you can."

"See, then," said Young Baybrook, "why I am so grieved. Think of Kitty. Think what I have got to tell her!"

His heart quite failed him again when he had come round to that, and he once more beat his scant head softly on the table, and was going; he soon began again, in a quietly resolute tone.

"However! Enough of that! You spoke some hours since to me, Sir, by consent, and you think they shall not be spoken in vain. I have got to do something. It is for me to go to, before all other things, it is for me to be convinced of this paper, for the sake of the Good Name that has no one else to put it forward, and for the sake of Kitty, for the sake of the Good Name, and my father's memory, not a word of this writing must be breathed to my mother, or to Kitty, or to any human creature. You agree in this?"

"I don't know what I have to think of us below," said the captain, "but for certain I can't oppose it. Now, as to tracing. How will you do?"

"They both, as by consent, bent over the paper again, and again carefully puzzled out the whole of the writing.

"I will not ask that this would stand, if all the writing was here, 'Inquire among the old men living there,' for example. Most like, you'll go to this village named here?" said the captain, pointing with his finger on the name.

"Yes! And Mr. Tregarthen is a Cornishman, and—to be sure!—comes from Lanrean."

"Does he?" said the captain, quietly. "As I ain't acquainted with him, who may he be?"

"Mr. Tregarthen is Kitty's father."

"Ay, ay!" cried the captain. "Now, you speak! Tregarthen knows this village of Lanrean, then?"

"Beyond all doubt he does. I have often heard him mention it, as being his native place. He knows it well."

"Stop half a moment," said the captain. "We want a name here. You could ask Tregarthen (or Kitty either) privately, for what names of old men he remembers in his time in those diggings? Hey?"

"I can go straight to his cottage, and ask him now."

"Take me with you," said the captain, rising in a solid way that had a most comfortable reliability in it, "and just a word more first. I have knocked about further than you, and have got along further than you. I have had, all my sea-going life long, to keep my wits polished bright with acid of Kitty's kind, for the service of the ship's instruments. I'll keep you company on this expedition, Sir, if you please, by talking any more than I do. Clench that hand o' yours in this hand of mine, and that's a speech on both sides."

Captain Jorgan took command of the expedition with that hearty shake. He at once relolded the paper exactly as before, replaced it in the bottle, put the cleaning cork into the oil-skin over the stopper, corded the whole to Young Baybrook's keeping, and led the way out.

But it was harder navigation below stairs than above. The instant they set foot in the parlor the quick, womanly eye detected that there was something wrong. Kitty exclaimed, frightened, as she ran to her lover's side, "Alfred! What's the matter?" Mrs. Baybrook cried out to the captain, "Gracious! what have you done to my son to change him so in one short minute?" And the young widow—who was there with her work upon her arm—was at first so agitated that she frightened the little boy, who held in her hand, who slid her face in her mother's skirts and screamed. The captain, conscious of being held responsible for this disturbance, only contemplated it with quite a guilty expression of countenance, and looked to the young fisherman for solace to his rescue.

"Kitty darling," said Young Baybrook, "Kitty, dearest love, I must go away to Lanrean, and I don't know how long it may be—not long, this very day. Worse than that—our marriage, Kitty, must be put off, and I don't know for how long."

Kitty, pale with fear, doubt and wonder and in anger, and pushed him from her with her hand.

"I've told you, Mrs. Baybrook," the young rigage put off? And you going to Lanrean! Why, in the name of the dear Lord?"

"Mother can only say why; I must not say why. It would be dishonorable and undutiful to say why."

"Dishonorable and undutiful?" returned the dame. "And is there nothing dishonorable or undutiful in the way you treat the peace of his own plighted love, and his mother's heart too, for the sake of the dark secrets and counsels of a wicked stranger in this house, that ever come here?" she apostrophized the innocent captain. "Who wanted you? Where did you come from? Why couldn't you stay where you last place, where, ever it is, instead of disturbing the peace of quiet neighboring folk?"

"And what," sobbed the poor little Kitty, "have I ever done to you, you hard and cruel captain, that you should come and harm me so?"

And then they both began to weep most pitifully, while the captain could only look from the one to the other, and, with his hand himself by the collar.

"Margaret," said the poor young fisherman, on his knees at Kitty's feet, while Kitty kept both her hands before her tearful face, to shut out the hateful face, and while her fingers wide asunder, and looked at him all the time: "Margaret, you have suffered so much, so uncomplainingly, and are so careful and considerate! Do take my part, for poor Hugh's sake!"

The captain had not expected to be appealed to in vain. "I will, Alfred," she returned, "and I do. I wish this gentleman had never come near us;" wherein the captain shook his head of himself to signify "but I take your part, for all that. I am sure you love some strong reason and some sufficient reason for this, Alfred, strange as it is, and even for not saying why you do it, strange as that is. And, Kitty darling, you love me, and I think no more than any one, for true love believes every thing, and bears every thing, and trusts every thing, and hopes every thing, and endures all things so too, for you know you have been blest with good sons, whose word was always as good as their bond, and who grew up in as true a sense of honor as any gentleman in this land. And I am sure you have been a sure call, mother, to double your living son than to doubt your dead son; and for the sake of the dear dead, I stand up for the right, Kitty."

"Wa'al now," the captain struck in, with enthusiasm, "this I say. That whether your opinion leads you to wear me as a young woman of sense and spirit and feeling; and I'd sooner have you than the best young woman in port, and a good half of the men I've ever fallen in with—or fallen out with, either."

Kitty would not return the captain's compliment, or appear fully to reciprocate his good opinion, but she applied herself to the consolation of Kitty, and Kitty's mother-in-law that was to have been next Monday week, and soon restored the parlor to a quiet condition.

"Kitty, my darling," said the young fisherman, "I must go to your father to entreat him still to trust me with the watched change and uncertainty, and to ask him for some directions concerning Lanrean. Will you come home? Will you come with me, Kitty?"

Kitty answered not a word, but rose sobbing, with the one hand holding head-dress at her ears. Captain Jorgan followed the lovers out, quite sheepishly pausing in the shop to give an instruction to Mr. Pettifer.

"Here, Tom!" said the captain, in a low voice. "Here's something in your line. Here's an old lady poorly and low in her spirits. Cheer her up a bit, Tom. Cheer 'em all up."

Mr. Pettifer, with a brisk nod of intelligence, immediately assumed his steward face, and went busily with quite helpful steward step into the parlor, where the captain had the great satisfaction of seeing him, through the glass-door, take the child in his arms (who offered no objection), and hand over Mrs. Baybrook, administering soft words of consolation.

"Though what he finds to say, unless he's telling her that it'll soon be over, or that meat people is as it first, or that it'll do her good afterward, I can not imagine!" was the captain's reflection as he followed the lovers.

He had not far to follow them, since it was but a short descent down the stony ways to the cottage of Kitty's father. But, short as the distance was, it was long enough to enable the captain to observe that he was fast becoming the village Ogre; for there was not a woman standing at her door, or a fisherman coming up or going down, who gave Young Baybrook a greeting which had in its tears, but she or he instantly darted a suspicious and indignant glance at the captain, as the foreigner who had come somehow to occasion this unusual spectacle. Consequently, when they came into Tregarthen's little garden—which formed the platform from which the cliff-road went Kitty peeping over the wall—the captain brought to, and stood off and on at the gate, while Kitty hurried to hide her tears in her own room, and Alfred spoke with her father, who was working in the garden. He had a rather lofty manner, but could scarcely be called old yet, with an agreeable face and a promising air of making the best of things. The conversation began on that side with great cheerfulness and good humor, but soon became distrustful, and then angry. That was the captain's cue for striking both into the conversation and the garden.

"Morning, sir!" said Captain Jorgan. "How do you do?"

The gentleman I am going away with," said the young fisherman to Tregarthen.

"Oh!" returned Kitty's father, surveying the unfortunate captain with a look of profound disdain. "I confess that I can't say I am glad to see you."

"No," said the captain, "and, to admit the truth, that seems to be the general opinion in these parts. But we'll be hasty; you may think better of me by-and-by."

"I hope so," observed Tregarthen.

"Wa'al, I hope so," observed the captain, quite at his ease; "more than that, I believe so—though you don't. Now, Mr. Tregarthen, you don't want to exchange words of mistrust with me, and if you did, you couldn't, because I wouldn't. You and I are old enough to know better than to judge against experience from surfaces and appearances; and if you haven't lived to find out the evil and injustice of rash judgments, you are lucky man."

The other seemed to shrink under this remark, and replied: "Sir, I dare lived to feel it deeply."

"Wa'al," said the captain, musingly, "now I've made a good cast without hawking it. Now, Tregarthen, here's a young man that you and I and all of us among the trees and fern on the summit of the hill above, to take breath and to look down at the beautiful sea. Suddenly the captain gave his leg a resounding slap, and cried, "Never knew such a right thing in all my life!"—and ran away.

The cause of this abrupt retirement on the part of the captain was little Kitty among the trees. The captain went out of sight and waited, and kept out of sight and waited, until it occurred to him to begin the search in another quarter. He lighted it, and smoked it out, and still he was out of sight and waiting. He stole within sight at last, and saw the lovers, with their arms entwined and their bent heads touching, moving slowly among the trees. At last the girls fame off from the others, and the captain said to himself, "Golden sun, golden sea, golden hills, golden girl, golden youth—golden state of things altogether!"

Nevertheless the captain found it necessary to hail his young companion before going out of sight again. In a few moments more he came up, and they began their journey.

"That still young woman with the fatherless child," said Captain Jorgan, as they took up their packs, "didn't throw her words away; but good honest words are never thrown away. And now that I am conveying you off from that lovely spot, I'll tell you that loves and relies and hopes, I feel just as if I was the smarting critter in the picters, with the light legs, the long nose, and the feather in his cap, the tips of whose mustaches get up nearer to his rosy eyes the more he grins."

The young fisherman know nothing of Mephistopheles; but he smiled when the captain stopped to double up his leg and slap his leg, and they went along in right good-fellowship.

CHAPTER II.—THE CLUB-ROOM.

A CERTAIN Moon, when the sun was well down over it, is as cold and rugged a scene as a traveler is likely to find in a year's travel. A Certain Moon, in the sky, is as black a solitude as the traveler is likely to wish himself well out of in the course of a life's wanderings. A Certain Moon, in a night fog, is a wilderness where the traveler needs to know his way well, or the chances are very strong that his life and his wanderings will soon perplex him no more.

Captain Jorgan and the young fisherman had fared but scantily all the southeast voyage. The first rising of the sun after their departure from the village of Stowaways. Thrice had the sun risen and set, and thrice had the sharp wind blown at them like some malevolent spirit bent on forcing them back. But the Captain Jorgan was not to be beaten with all the winds that blow, and too much accustomed to circumvent their slightest weaknesses, and get the better of them in his own way, to be beaten by any member of the airy family. Taking the wind as it was his opinion that it had scattered little what wind blew, or how hard it blew; so he was as indifferent to the wind on this occasion as a woman can be who frequently says—"that it freshened him up," and who regarded it in the light of an old acquaintance. One might have supposed, from his way, that there was quite a kind of fraternal understanding between Captain Jorgan and the wind, as between two powerful fighters often opposed to one another. The young fisherman, for his part, was accustomed within his narrower limits to hold half-waking communion with had his anxious object before him; so the wind went by him, too, little heeded, and went upon its way to kick higher game.

Their varied course had lain by the side of the sea, where the brown rocks cleft it into fountains of spray, and inland where once barren wastes were reclaimed and cultivated, and by lonely villages of poor-seeming cabins with mud walls, and by a town or two with an old church and a market-place. But, always travelling through a sparsely inhabited country and with a broad expanse of sea to come at last upon the true Cornish Moor within reach of Lancelot Nare. Not that granite moor of miners passed them here, with metallic masks of faces, ghastly with dust of copper and tin; anon, solitary works of human hideous, with their tall chimney of torturing wheels and cogs and chains, writhing up hill-sides, were the few scattered hints of human presence in the long journey. Anon, long intervals, the bitter wind, howling and tearing like a fierce wild monster, had them all to itself.

"A sing'lar thing it is," said the captain, looking round on the barren desert of rock and turf, poor moss, "how like this airth is to the men that live upon it! Here's a spot of country rich with hidden metals, and it puts on the worst rags of clothes possible, and crouches and shivers and makes believe to be so poor that it has not enough as afford a feed for a beast. Just like a human miser, ain't it?"

"But they find the miser out," returned the young fisherman, pointing to where the earth by the water-courses and along the valleys was turned up, for mining, in trying for metal.

"Ay, they find him out," said the captain; "but he makes a struggle of it, my mate, and holds back all he can. He's a 'cute 'un."

The gloom of evening was already gathering on the dreary scene, and they were, by a long round and beat, a dozen miles from their destination. But the captain, in his long-skirted blue coat and his boots and his hat and his square handkerchief, and without any extra defense against the weather, walked coolly along with his hands in his pockets; as if he lived under-ground somewhere hard by, and had just come up to show his friend the road.

"I'd have liked to have had a look at this place, too," said the captain, "when there was a monstrous sweep of water rolling over it, dragging the powerful great stones along and piling 'em atop of one another, and depositing the foundations for all manner of superstitions. Bless you! the old pirates, smart mechanical critters as they were, never piled up many of these stones. What the lever that moved 'em. When you see 'em thick and blunt towards one point of the compass, and fined away thin towards the opposite point, you may be as good as moral sure that the name of the ancient Druid that fixed 'em was Water."

The captain referred to natural blocks of stone presenting this characteristic, which were wonderfully balanced and heaped on one another, on a desolate hill. Looking back at them, as they stood out against the lurid glare of the west, just then expiring, they were not unlike enormous petrifications of the Egyptian ghetto on crags and peaks, and had been petrified there.

"But it's a monstrous mystery," said the captain, "for all."

"Do you believe in the annals of that sailor old Arch-Druid, Water, and it's old in the annals of the said old pirate-critter too. It's a mighty interesting thing to set your boot (as I did this day) on a rough, honey-combed old stone, with holes nothing can make but water-drops visible upon it: which the schoolar that go about with hammers, chipping pieces off the rocks and fossils, has to be an inscription entreating prayers for the soul of some far-agoes-but-up critter of a governor and ever-lovin' wife, or children, or all. Here the captain stopped to slap his leg. "It's a mighty interesting thing to come upon a score or two of stones set up in a circle, a hundred-mile short, some still, some leaning here, some leaning there, and no two alike, and no visibly-proper use in 'em, and may be still—to be a group of Cornish men that got changed into that geological formation for having a game on Sunday—which I wouldn't have it in my country, I reckon, even if they could get it—but it's very interesting."

In this the captain, indeed, is amused him, was quite sincere. Quite as much as when he added, after looking well about him, "Here's Dolcoath coming up as the sun goes down, will spread, and we shall have to feel our way and Lancelot full as much as use it."

All the way along the young fisherman had spoken at times to the captain of his interrupted story, and of the fisher-folk and their way of recitation that must be made, and of the cherished plans of his heart, as occasion presented itself to put that aside for it. In his simple faith and honor, he seemed incapable of entertaining the idea that it was within the bounds of probability to evade the doing of what their inquiries should establish to be right. This was very agreeable to Captain Jorgan, and won his perfect confidence. Therefore he now turned the discourse back into that channel, and encouraged the young fisherman by all kinds and to calculate how many years it would take, without a share in the fishery, to establish a home for her, and to make it comfortable for her, dwelling on its anxieties.

Meanwhile it fell very dark, and the fog became dense, though the wind howled at them and hit them as savagely as ever. The captain had carefully taken his bearings, and steered by them, and carried his pocket-compass with him; the young fisherman, too, possessed that kind of collateral knowledge of the coast that habit is often found among men of such pursuits. But although they held a true course in the main, and corrected it as many days' toil as they could by the compass and a light obtained with great difficulty in the lower depths of the sky, it was clear that they must help losing the road often. On such occasions they would become involved in the difficult ground of the loose granite, and, climbing to the highest stone crop, would emerge upon the road at some point they had passed before they left it, and thus would lose the good deal of work to be done. But as the young fisherman was not easily lost, and the captain had taken his bearings before the night came on, and carried his pocket-compass with him; the young fisherman, too, possessed that kind of collateral knowledge of the coast that habit is often found among men of such pursuits. over the broad acres of beautiful France. Many were the hotels, many the auberges, many the bad dinners, many the damp beds, and many the bills which I encountered en route. Many were the dull old fortified towns over whose draw-bridges I rolled; many the still more dull old towns without fortifications and without draw-bridges, at which my avocations made it necessary for me to halt.

I don't know how it was that on the morning when I was to start from the town of Doulaise, with the intention of sleeping at Fresne-la-Grande, I was an hour later in commencing my journey than I ought to have been. I have said I don't know how it was, but this is scarcely true. I do know how it was. It was because on that morning, to use a popular expression, my temper went wrong. So it was an hour later than it ought to have been, Gentlemen, when I drew up the sheepskin lining of my carriage across my two legs, and establishing my little dog comfortably on the seat beside me, set off on my journey. In all my experience I was accompanied by a favorite terrier of mine, which I had brought with me from England. I never travelled without him, and found her a companion.

It was a miserable day in the month of October, a perfectly gray sky, with white gleams about the horizon, gave unmistakable evidence that the small drizzle which was falling would continue for the next two or three hundred years. It was cold and cheerless weather, and on the deserted road I was pursuing there was absolutely a human being (unless it was an occasional cantonnier, or road-mender) to break the solitude. A deserted way indeed, with poplars on each side of it, which had been pollarded low in the autumn, and had shed their leaves in abundance all over the road, so that my man's postboys had quite a muffled sound as she trampled them under her hoofs. Widely-extending flats spread out on either side till the eye was lost in an inconceivably melancholy scene, and the road itself was so perfectly straight, that you could see something like two miles of it distinctly from a point in front of you, while a similar view was visible through the little window at the back of the carriage.

In the hurry of the morning's departure I had omitted to inquire, as I generally do on arriving on unknown road, at what village it would be best for me to halt, about noon, to look after the wants of the most respectable house of public entertainment in my way; so that when I arrived between twelve and one o'clock at a certain place where four roads met, and when at one of the corners formed by their union I saw a great barn-looking inn, with the sign of the Tête Noire floating in front, I had nothing for it but to put up there, without knowing any thing of the character of the house.

The look of the place did not please me. It was a great, lone, wooden, whitewashed-looking thing, which seemed much larger than was necessary, and presented a black and dirty appearance, which, considering the dirty time from any point, was difficult to account for. All the doors and all the windows were shut, and there was no sign of any human element I hesitated whether I should turn into the open gates of the stable-yard, or go farther in search of some more attractive hallucination. But as my mare was tired, I was more than half-way on my road, and this would be the last meal of the day's journey. Besides, Gentlemen, why not put up here? If I was only going to stop at such places of entertainment as completely suited me, externally as well as internally, I had better give up traveling altogether.

There were no more signs of life in the interior of the yard than were presented by the external aspect of the house as I fronted that. Its inhabitants seemed shut up. All the stables and outhouses were characterized by closed doors, without so much as a cat lounging in their thresholds to indicate that these buildings were sometimes put to a practical use. There was no manure steaming about the yard, and no living creature, pig, no ducks, no fowls. It was perfectly still and quiet, and as in the case of the outside of the inn, small rain descends quite straight, without a breath of air to drive it one way or the other, the silence was complete and unbroken. I gave a loud shout, and began undoing the harness while my summons was taking effect.

The first person whom the sound of my voice appeared to have reached was a small but precocious boy, who opened a door in the side of the house, and descending the flight of steps which led to it, approached to aid me in my task. I was just undoing the final buckle on one of the horses, when, happening to turn round, I discovered, standing close behind me, a personage who had approached so quietly that it would have been a confusing thing to find him so near even if there had been nothing in his appearance which was calculated to startle me. He was the most ill-looking man, Gentlemen, that it was ever my fortune to behold. The worst fifty men you could collect could give him, his dry, spare nature had kept him as light and active as a restless boy. An absence of flesh, however, was not the only want I felt to exist in the personal appearance of the landlord of the Tête Noire. There was a most serious redundancy in other parts of him. A want of any hint of mercy, or conscience, or any accountable approach to the better side (if there was a better side) of the man's nature. When first I looked at his eyes, as he stood behind me in the open court-yard, as they rapidly glanced over the comely points of my horse, and thence to the packages inside my carriage, and the portmanteau strapped on in front of it—at that time the color of his eyes appeared to me to be of an almost orange tinge; but when, a minute afterward, we stood together in the dark stable, I noted that a kind of blue phosphorescence gleamed upon their surfaces, vailing their real hue, and imparting to them a tigerish lustre. The moment when I remarked this, by-the-by, was when the organs I have been describing were fixed upon the very large gold ring which I had not ceased to wear on the little finger of my bridle hand, and which you may see upon my finger now. There were two other things about this man that struck me. These were, a bold red projecting lump of flesh at the back of his head, and a deep scar, which a scrap of frouzy whisker on his cheek wholly declined to conceal.

"A nasty day for a journey of pleasure," said the landlord, looking at me with a satirical smile.

"Perhaps it is not a journey of pleasure," I answered, briefly.

"We have few such travelers on the road now," said the evil-faced man. "The railroads make the country a desert, and the road is not safe as it was three hundred years ago."

"I'll risk it," I answered, carelessly, "for those who are obliged to travel by them. Nobody else. I should think, would be likely to make use of them."

"Will you come into the house?" said the landlord, abruptly, looking me full in the face.

I never felt a stronger inclination than I entertained toward the idea of entering this man's doors. Yet what other course was open to me? My mare was already half through the first installment of her oats, so there was no more excuse for remaining in the stable. To go on my way in the drenching rain was out of the question, and to remain sitting in my calèche would have been a worse indication of suspicion than to enter. Besides, I had nothing since the morning's coffee, and I wanted something to eat myself. So I answered nothing to be done, then, but to accept my ill-looking friend's offer. He led the way up the flight of steps which gave access to the interior of the building.

The room in which I found myself was entered through the door at the top of these steps, was one of those rooms which an excess of light not only renders gloomy, but in which it seems as if an additional degree of gloom. There is sometimes this character about light, and I have seen before now a very dismal room lighted by a gas-chandelier, which have owed a good share of their melancholy to an immoderate amount of cold gray daylight. This room, then, was one of those rooms, was one of those which, on a wet day, seemed several degrees lighter than on a fine one. The window was not be really lighter than the thing that it is, but it seemed so. It also appeared larger than the whole out-door world; and, as I afterward found, not be either, but seemed so. Vast as it was, there appeared through two glass-doors at the end of it walls another apartment of similar dimensions. It was not a square room, nor an oblong room, but was rambling and irregular, as I have said, in its phenomenon which, as you have very likely observed, Gentlemen, has always an unpleasant effect. The billiard-table, which was the only thing in the apartment, though really of the usual size, looked quite a trifling piece of furniture in it. It was of dark wood, which were planted sparingly here and there for purposes of refreshment, they were quite lost in the vastness of the surrounding void. A cupboard, a rack of billiard cues, a marking-board, and a print of the murder of the Archbishop of Paris in the Chamber of Deputies, were the furniture of wall. The ceiling, as far as one could judge of any thing at that height, was low, and was dotted by an enormous beam with rings fastened into it adapted for nautical purposes, and splashed with the yellow wash which covered the ceiling and the walls had just been decorated. Even my little terrier, whom I had been obliged to take up in my arms on account of the dirty state of the floor, manifested to fly at the shins of our detested landlord, looked round the room with a degree of scorn as I set her down, and trembled and shivered as if she would come out of her skin.

"And so you don't like him, Nelly, and your little beads of eyes, that look up at me from under that hairy pent-house, with nothing but love in them, are all alive to the villainy of this man, and set upon his sinister face? And how did he get that scar, Nelly? Fighting, or drunk, or has he tempted his last traveler? And what do you think of his eyes, Nelly? And what do you think of the back of his head? Is it not like the back of a bull? he's about now, eh? What mischief do you think he's hatching? Don't you wish you were sitting by my side in the calèche, that we were driving on the free road again?"

To all these questions and remarks my little companion responded very intelligibly by faint thumpings of the ground with her tail, and by certain lickings of her chops, which, from long habits of intercourse, I understood very well to mean that whatever my opinion might be she coincided in it.

I had ordered an omelet and some wine when I first entered the house, and I now sat waiting for it, I observed that my landlord would every now and then leave what he was about in the other room—where I observed that he was busily preparing my meal—and would come and peer at me furtively through the glass-doors which separated the room I was in with that in which he was. Once, too, I heard him go out, and I felt sure that he had retired to the stables, to examine more minutely the value of my horse and carriage.

I took it into my head that my landlord was a desperate rogue under his business name, and resolved to support him; that he had remarked that I was in possession of valuable property, and that he might be would forthwith commit a murder, and a quantity of luggage in which there were probably articles of price. I was well armed, and was of strong my person, including a sum of money, without which I could not be traveling about, as he saw me, from place to place.

While my mind was amusing itself with these cheerful reflections a little girl, of about twelve years old, entered the room through the glass-doors, and, after honoring me with a long stare, went to the cupboard at the other end of the apartment, and, opening it with a bunch of keys which she brought with her in her hand, took out a small white paper packet, about four inches square, and retired with it by the way by which she had entered; still staring at me very diligently this, from want of proper attention to where she was going, she got (as I am happy to state) a severe bump against the door as she passed through it. She was a horrid little girl this, with eyes that in shirking the necessity of looking straight at any body or any thing, had got at last to look only at her nose—landing it, probably, as bad a nose as could be met with, and therefore a conspicuous companion. She had, moreover, frizzy and flaxy hair, was exceedingly dirty, and had a most awkward way of going along without looking at what she was about, which was very noisome and detestable.

It was not long before this young lady reappeared, bearing in her hand a plate containing the omelet, which she placed upon the table without going through the previous form of laying a cloth. She next cut an immense piece of bread from a loaf that was like a ring, and, having clapped this also upon the dirtiest part of the table, and having further favored me with a frigid look of scorn, disappeared once more. She disappeared to fetch the wine. When this shall been become sure of, I began the preparations for my feast were considered complete, and I was left to enjoy it alone.

I must add to by mention that the horrid waiting-maid appeared to excite as strong an antipathy in the breast of my little dog as that which my landlord had done, and stirred up; and I am happy to say, that as the child left the room I was obliged to exert all my power to prevent Nelly from harassing her retreating calves.

Gentlemen, an experienced traveler soon learns that he must not be too particular: closing his eyes, nose, and ears to all suggestions. I set to work then, at the omelet with energy, and at the tough meat that went good will, and had swallowed half a tumbler of wine and water, when a thought struck me which made me put down knife and fork, and push the plate upon the table. I had no sooner done this than I raised it again to my lips, took a hearty draught of the liquid about in my mouth two or three times, and spat it out upon the floor. But I uttered, as I did so, in an audible tone, the monosyllable "Pooh!"

"Pooh! Nelly," I said, looking down at my dog, who was regarding me intensely with her head on one side—"pooh! Nelly," I repeated, "what frantic and inconceivable nonsense!"

And what was it that I thus stigmatized? What was it that had given me pause in the middle of my dinner? What was the thought was it that caused me to set down my glass with half its contents remaining in it? It was a suspicion, driven straight and sudden into my mind by the unwarranted recesses of my soul, that the wine I had just been drinking, and which, contrary to my custom, I had washed with water, was drugged!

There are some thoughts which, like noxious insects, come creeping into one's mind as often as we repulse them. We confute them in argument, prove them illogical, leave them not leg to stand on, and yet there they are at the next moment as brisk as bees, and stronger on their pins than ever. It was just such a thought as this with which I had now to deal. It was well to say "Pooh!" it was well to remind myself that this was the nineteenth century, that I was not acting a part in a melodrama, that such things as I was thinking of were only known in romances, and would no more have to set a respectable man down as a murderer, because he had peculiar colored eyes and a scar upon his cheek, were such things to do. There seemed to be two separate parties within me: one possessed of great powers of argument and of judgment: the other, an irrational or opposition party, whose chief force consisted in a system of stupid assertion, which all the arguments of the rational party were insufficient to confute.

It was not long before an additional force was imparted to the efforts of the irrational party, by certain symptoms which began to develop themselves in my physical organization. I would have seemed favorable to the view of the case I was so anxious to refute. In spite of all my efforts to the contrary, I could not help feeling that some very remarkable sensations were slowly and gradually stealing over me. First of all, I began to feel that I was not at fault in my system of calculating distances: so that when I took up any object and endeavored to replace it on the table, I either brought it into contact with that article of furniture with a crash, in consequence of conceiving it to be further off than it was; or else, imagining that the table was several inches nearer to the ceiling than was the case, I slumbered wherever I held in my hand some object I had found that I was confiding it to space. Then, again, my head felt heavy, and my shoulders began to wax a slight tingling in my hands, and a sense that they, as well as my feet (which were very cold), were asleep. Then, at the same time, and were also surrounded with numerous rapidly revolving wheels of light streaming from Catherine-wheels presses to ignition. It also appeared to me that when I spoke to my dog my voice had a curious sound, and my words were very imperfectly articulated.

It would happen, too, that when I looked toward the glass-doors, my landlord was there, peering at me through the muslin curtain: or the horrid little girl would enter, with no obvious intention, and having loitered for a little time about the room, would leave it again. At length the landlord himself came in, and coolly walking up to the table on which I was seated, glanced at the hardly tasted wine before me.

"It would appear that the wine of the country is not to your taste," he said.

"It is good enough," I answered, as carelessly as I could; "the words sounding to me as if they were uttered inside the cupola of St. Paul's, and were conveyed by iron tubes to the place I occupied.

I was in a strange state—perfectly conscious, but imperfectly able to control my thoughts, my words, my actions. I believe my landlord stood staring down at me as I sat staring up at him, and exchanging with me Catherine-wheels as they revolved round his eyes and nose and chin—Gentlemen, they seemed absolutely to kiss when they got to the scar on his cheek.

At this time a noisy party entered the main room of the auberge, which I have spoken of as having visible through the glass-doors, and the landlord had to leave me for a time to go and attend to them. I heard him say that they must have a slight and strongly-resisted done, and that when I started out it it was from in consequence of the violent barking of my terrier. The landlord was in the room; he was just unlocking the cupboard from which the little girl had taken the white packet. He took out just such another paper parcel, and returned again through the door. As he did so, a sensation of unspeakable wonderment what had become of the little girl. Presently his evil face appeared again at the door.

"I am going to prepare the coffee," said the landlord; "perhaps monsieur will like it better here?"

As the man disappeared I started suddenly and violently upon my feet. I could decieve myself no longer. My thoughts were like lightning.

"The wine having been taken in so small a quantity and so profusely mixed with water, has done its work (as this man can see) but imperfectly. The coffee will finish that work. He is now preparing it. He expects that I shall drink it—then can be no doubt. I will leave this place while I yet can. Now or never; if those men whose voices I hear in the other room do not leave it will be too late. With so many witnesses no attempt can be made to murder my property. I will not sleep—I will not arrive my muscles to their work, and get away from this place."

Gentlemen, in compassion, in the name of nerves of distressing sensitiveness, I have received from Heaven a remarkable power of controlling my nerves for a time. I staggered to my feet, clearing it after me more violently than I had intended. Then I recovered. The fresh air making me feel very giddy—into the yard.

As I went down the steps I saw the truculent little girl in the yard. I have always loved entering the yard, followed by a blacksmith, carrying a hammer and pincers in his unwashed right hand, catching sight of me, the little girl spoke quickly to the blacksmith, and in an instant they both changed their course, which was directly toward the stable, and entered an outhouse on the other side of the yard. The thought entered my head that they might have been sent for to shoe my mare's feet, so that in the event of the dragged coffee I might be quite still to make to proceed. This horrible idea added new force to my generations. I seized the shafts of my carriage and commenced dragging it out of the yard, instead to the front of the house: feeling that if it was once in the highway there would be less possibility of offering any further impediment to my flight. I am conscious of having fallen twice to the ground in the endeavor, but I managed to get the thing out. Next, I fastened to the stable. My mare was still harnessed, with the exception of the bridle. This I managed to get the bit into her mouth. And as incapable of calculating distances as a drunken man, I managed, but how I know not, to accomplish the assistance of the boy I had seen. I was making a final effort to fasten the trace to its little hook, when a hand was behind me said:

"Are you going away without drinking your coffee?"

I turned round and saw my landlord standing close beside me. He was watching my bungling efforts to get the harness, but he made no movement to assist me.

"I do not want any coffee," I answered.

"Or cognac?" he said, with a sneer. "I shall expect that the gentleman is not a great drinker. You have been drinking your horse much of a rest," he added, presently.

"I am in haste. What have I to pay?"

"You will not take something with me, old landlord; "a glass of brandy before starting in the wet?"

"No, nothing more. What have I to pay?"

"You will at least come in for an instant and warm your feet at the stove."

"No. Tell me at once how much I am to pay."

Baffled in all his efforts to get me again into the house, apparently my landlord had nothing for it but to answer my demand.

"Four litres of oats," he muttered, "a half-litre of brandy, bread, wine, coffee"—he emphasized the last two words with a malignant grin—"seven francs fifty centimes."

My mare was by this time somehow or other buckled into the shafts, and now I had to get myself into the calèche, to pay the man the bank-note which was given me, and to receive my change. I was still very giddy, my sight was dim, and, as I brought out my purse (which was a large one), opening with a hinge, I managed while paying the bill to turn the purse over and to drop some gold pieces.

"Gold!" cried the boy who had been helping me to harness the horse: speaking as if by an irrepressible impulse.

The landlord made a sudden dart at it, but instantly checked himself.

"People want plenty of gold," he said, "when they make a journey of pleasure."

I felt myself getting worse. I could not pick up the gold pieces as they lay on the ground. I fell on my knees, and my head bowed forward. I could not hit the place where a coin lay; I could see it but I could not guide my fingers to it. Still I could not pay. I got some of the money up, and the stable-boy, who was very officious in assisting me, gave me one or two pieces—to this day, I don't know how many he kept. I cast a hasty glance around, and seeing no more gold on the ground, raised myself by a desperate effort and scrambled to my place in the carriage. I shook the reins instinctively, and the mare began to move.

The well-trained beast was beginning to trot away as cleverly as usual, when a thought suddenly flashed into my brain, as will sometimes happen when we are just going to sleep—a thought which woke me up like a pistol-shot, and caused me to spring forward and gather up the reins so violently as almost to bring the mare back upon her haunches.

"My dog, my dear little Nelly!" I had left her behind!

To abandon my little favorite was a thing that never entered my head. "No, I never will—I must go back to the horrible place I have just escaped from. He has seen my gold, too, now," I said to myself, as I turned my horse round with many clumsy efforts; "the man who were drinking in the subterranean gone; and what is worse than all, I was more under the influence of the drugs I have swallowed."

As I approached the auberge once more I remember noticing that its walls looked blacker than ever, that the rain was falling more heavily, that the landlord and the stable-boy were on the steps of the inn, evidently on the look-out for me. One thing more I noticed—on the road a small speck, as of some vehicle nearing the place.

"I have come back for my dog," said I.

"I know nothing of your dog."

"It is false! I left her shut up in the inner room."

"Go there and find her, then," retorted the man, throwing off all disguise.

"I will," was my answer.

I knew it was a trap to get me into the house; I knew I was lost if I entered it; but I did not care. I descended into the carriage, I left the inn up the steps with the aid of the balusters, I heard the barking of my little Nelly as I passed through the outer room, and I approached the glass-door, steadying myself as I went by the articles of furniture in the room. I burst the door open, and my favorite bounded into my arms.

And now I felt that it was too late. As I approached the door-step to the road I saw my carriage being led round to the back of the house, and the form of the landlord appeared in the door-way blocking up the passage. I made an effort to push past him, but it was useless. My little Nelly out of my arms, and I was once outside; the landlord slammed the door heavily; and I felt, without sense or knowledge, at his feet.

* * * * *

It was dark, Gentlemen—dark and very cold. The little patch of sky I was looking up at was, for it a marvelous number of stars, which would have looked bright but for a blazing planet which seemed to shine, in the absence of all other lights, as the other luminaries round about it. To the thus was, in spite of the cold, quite a luxurious sensation. As I lay there, I tried to see as little (for it seemed to have been in this position some time), I felt cold and weak. All this memory came to me in a stirring class beside me, and first a cold nose touching my hand, and then a hot tongue licking it. My dog was there, then, and the sense of which, perhaps, more marked than the rest, might be the cause of my having awoke at all.

Presently, other matters began to dawn upon my mind through the medium of my senses. I could see the regular movement of a horse's head walking in front of me; surely I saw, too, part of the figure of a man—a pair of square shoulders, the head of a coat, and a head with a wide-awake hat upon it. I could hear the occasional sounds of occasional words seemed to come proceeding from this figure, and which were addressed to the horse. I could hear the tinkling of bells upon the animal's neck. Lastly, too, I heard a rumbling sound behind us, and the tread of a horse's feet—just as if there were another vehicle following that in which we were. Was there any thing more? Yes, in the distance I was able to detect the twinkling of a light or two, as if a town were not far off.

Now, Gentlemen, as I lay and observed all these things, there was such a languor shed over my spirits, such a sense of utter lack of responsibility and weakness, that I hardly cared to ask myself what it all meant, or to inquire how I was, or how I came there. A conviction that all was well with me, lay like an anodyne upon my heart, and it was only after a gradually long interval of curiosity as to how I came to be so developed itself in my brain. I dare say we had been jogging along for a quarter of an hour during which time I was perfectly conscious, before I struggled up into a sitting posture, and recognized the hooded back of the man at the horse's head.

"Dufay!"

The man with the hooded coat who was walking by the side of the horse, suddenly cried out "Ho!" in a strong voice; then ran to the back of the carriage and cried out "Wo!" again; and then we came to a stand-still. In another moment he had mounted to the step of the carriage and had taken me cordially by the hand.

"What," he said, "awake at last? Thank Heaven! I had almost begun to despair of you."

"My dear friend, what does all this mean? Where am I? Where did you come from? This is not my cabriole, that is not your horse."

"Both are safe behind," said Dufay, heartily; "and having told you so much, I will tell you that another word till you are safe and warm at the Lion d'Or. See! There are the lights of the town. Now, not another word." And pulling the horse-cloth under which I was lying more closely over me, my friend dismounted from the step, started the vehicle with the customary cry of "Allons donc!" and a crack of the whip, and we were soon once more in motion.

Chatting Dufay was a man into whose company circumstances had thrown me very often, and with whom I had become intimate from choice. Of the numerous class to which he belonged, those men whose sturdy vehicles and sturdier horses are to be seen standing in the yards and stables of all the inns in provincial France—the class of the commis-voyageurs, or French commercial travelers—Castaing Dufay was more than a favorable specimen. I was very fond of him. In the course of our intimacy I had been fortunate enough to have the opportunity of being useful to him in more matters than one importance. I think, Gentlemen, we like those who have served quite as well as they like us.

The truth was, Dufay was a rogue, as I was not long before we turned into the yard of the Lion d'Or and found ourselves in the midst of wagons and lighthouses, and among the latter of which, after the dangers I had passed through, looked perfectly angelic.

I had no idea till I attempted to move how weak and dazed I was. I was too far gone for dinner. A cup of tea was the only thing I coveted, and I was soon in possession of both.

I was no sooner snugly ensconced with my head on the pillow, and my feet upon the logs as they sparkled—my little Nelly lying outside the counterpane—when my friend visited himself once more, and volunteered to relieve my curiosity as to the circumstances of my escape from the Tête Noire. It was now my turn to refuse to listen, as I had been his before to refuse to speak.

"Not one word," I said, "till you have had good dinner, after which you will come up and sit beside me, and tell me all I am longing to know. And stay—you'll do me the favor to see to my horse; when you come up you will bring a plateful of bones for Nelly; she will not leave me to-night, I warn you, so you may as well provide."

"She deserves some dinner," said Dufay, as he left the room, "if for think it is through her instrumentality that I am here to tell the adventure."

The bliss in which I lay after Dufay had left the room is beyond description. To have got safely through some great danger, or who, at least, are newly relieved from some condition of severe and protracted suffering, is to be in a state of perfect repose and happiness.

When my friend came back he brought—not only a plate of fowl-bones for NeNy, but a basin of soup for me. When I had finished lapping it up, and while my face was still crunching the bones, Dufay spoke as follows:

"I said just now that it was to your little dog you owe the preservation of your life, and I must now tell you how it was. You remember that you left Doulaise this morning—"

"It seems a week ago," I interrupted.

"This morning," continued Dufay. "Well! I drove back myself to the Tête Noire. When I came into it, having made a small stage before breakfast, I heard where you were gone, and as I was going that way, too, I resolved to give you the same rest of a couple of hours while I breakfasted and transacted some business of my own, and then set out after you. 'Have you any idea,' I said, as I left the inn at Doulaise, 'whether monsieur meant to stop at the Tête Noire?' 'No,' said the garçon did not know. 'Let me see,' I said, 'the Tête Noire at Marcoussil would be a likely place, wouldn't it?' 'Yes,' said the garçon, 'but monsieur does not enjoy a good character, and no one from here ever stops there.' 'Ah!' I said, 'then I must be more of what he said, 'I shall be sure to find him. I will inquire after him as I go along.'

"The afternoon was fine, and when I came within sight of the inn of the Tête Noire. As you know, I am a little near-sighted, but I was, as I drew near the place, surprised to give my attention to a kind who being taken round to the yard at the back of the house. I thought nothing of this, as I should have paid no attention to had not my attention been suddenly caught by the violent barking of a dog. The barking seemed to be trying to admittance at the closed door of the inn. At a second glance I knew the dog to be yours. I put up my horse, I left the man, and ascended the steps of the auberge. One sniff at my shins was enough to convince me that all was not well at hand, and her excitement as I approached the door was frantic.

"On my entering the house I did not at first see you, but on looking in the direction toward which your dog had hastened as soon as the door was opened, I saw a common staircase, which led out of one corner of the apartment I was standing in, up to the first floor. Presently, were you dragged up the stairs in the arms of a very ill-looking man, assisted by (if possible) a still more ill-looking little boy. The man was the host himself. At sight of me the man deposited you upon the stairs, and advanced to meet me.

"'What is monsieur doing with that gentleman?' I asked.

"'He is unwell,' replied the ill-looking man, 'and I am helping him up stairs to bed.'

"That gentleman is a friend of mine. What is the meaning of his being in a state?'

"'How should I know?' was the answer; 'I suppose monsieur has taken something to drink.'

"Well, then, I am said I, approaching the place where you were lying; 'and I prescribe, to begin with, that he shall have this place at once.'

"I must own," continued Dufay, "that you were looking horribly ill, and as I bent over and felt your hardly fluttering pulse, I felt for a moment doubtful whether it was safe to move you. However, I determined to risk it.

"'Will you help me,' I said, 'to move this gentleman to his carriage?'

"'No,' said the ruffian, 'he is not fit to travel. Besides, what right have you over him?'

"The right of being his friend.'

"'How do I know that?'

"'Because I tell you so. See, his dog knows me.'

"And suppose I decline to accept that as evidence, and refuse to let this gentleman leave my house in his present state of health?'

"'You dare not do it.'

"'Why?'

"'Because,' I answered, slowly, 'I should go to the Gendarmerie in the village, and mention under what suspicious circumstances I found my friend here, and because your house has not the best of characters.'

"The man was silent for a moment, as if a little baffled. He seemed, however, determined to try once more.

"'And suppose I close my doors, and decline to let either of you go; what is to prevent me?'

"'In the first place,' I answered, 'I will effectually prevent your detaining me single-handed. I also have assistance within, as you especially ought to know, as I left my coachman and my servant in charge of my carriage, which I went to in the back of my carriage, and then leading my own beast by the bridle I managed to start the process. And at this point (I say it a foot-pace) we turned our backs upon the Tête Noire. And now you know my story.'

"I feel, Castaing, as if I should never be able to think of this adventure, or to speak of it again, without a shudder. It was indeed a ghastly aspect, that I reckon at the mere memory of it."

"Not a bit of it," said Dufay, cheerily; "you will live to be the hero of a thrilling tale some winter night, take my word for it."

"Gentlemen, Dufay's opinion is verified. May the tectotum fall next time with more judgment!

* * * * *

"Wa'al, now!" said Captain Jorgan, rising, with his hand upon the sleeve of his fellow-traveler, or to keep him down; "I congratulate you, sir, on that adventure, unpleasant at the time, but pleasant to look back upon, as many adventures in many lives are. Mr. Tredgear, you had a feeling for your money on that occasion, and it went hard on being stolen Money. It was not a sum of five hundred pounds, was it?"

"It was not a sum of five hundred pounds."

"I wish it had been half as much," was the reply.

"Thank you, sir. Might I ask the question of you that has been already put? About this place Chatsworth, did you ever hear of any circumstances whatever that might seem to have a bearing—any how—on that question?"

"Never."

"Thank you again for a straightfor'ard answer," said the captain, apologetically. "You see, we have referred to this matter, Mr. Tredgear, and happening in among the inhabitants present, we have heard nothing. In my country we always do use opportunities."

"And you turn them to good account, I believe, and prosper?"

"It's a fact, sir," said the captain, "that we get along. Yes, we get along, sir—But I stop the tectotum."

It was twirled again, and fell to David Polwath's share—a one-eyed old sea dog, with a pig-tail, the captain whispered to young Raybrock, "and as hard as nails. And I admire," added the captain, glancing about, "what a wonderful Penzeweis is here, and which is he?"

David Polwath stroked down the long iron-gray hair that fell massively upon the shoulders of his large-buttoned coat, and spake thus:

THE QUESTION WAS, DID HE throw himself over the cliff of set purpose, or did he lose his way in the dark and fall over accidentally, or was he pushed over by some person or persons unknown?

His fall was found nearly fifty yards below the cliff, caught in the low branches of the trees that overhung the water at the foot of the track down the cliff. He was grievously bruised and disfigured, so much so as to be hardly recognizable; but for his clothing, and the name on his linen, I doubt whether any body would have identified him except myself. There was, however, no suspicion of foul play; the place where the body had been driven about among the stones that encumber the bed of the river a long way below the fall.

When I speak of the fall, I speak of the Ashendell, by Ashendell village, whose name it bears. The village is a mile from Chatsworth, for the information of strangers.

He had been seen by many persons about the village during the day; I myself had seen him go up the hill past the parsonage toward the church; which I rather think, considering who was buried there, and how, and why. I will even confess that I watched him; and was—and am—convinced that he would, since he had the heart to go near the place at all—round to the back of the church, where Stuart's monument is, and there he sat down, standing, sitting by himself on the low wall for an hour or more. Sometimes, he turned to look across the valley toward the sea; and of I had seen him there before, with Honor beside him, watching, while he sketched the beautiful landscape—and sometimes he had his back to it, and his head down, as if he were watching her grave. Not that there is any thing pleasant or comforting to read there, as on the graves of good Christian people who have died in their beds; for, being a suicide, when they buried her on the north side of the church it was at dusk, and without any service, and the spot was marked by a stone only as big as a mound leveled and turfed over, and I wish he would; it always hurts me when I go up to Sunday service, to see that ragged grave lying in the shadow of the wall, for I remember the pretty little lass ever since she could run alone; and though she was passionate, her heart was as good as gold. She had been religiously brought up, and I am quite sure in my own mind, let the coroner's inquest have said what it will, that she was out of herself, and Bedlam-mad when she did it.

The verdict on him was "accidental death," and he had a decent funeral—parson, clerk, and sexton, complete; and there he lies, only a stone's-throw from Honor, with a cut or two of granite over him, and an inscription, nothing to what a great man he was in his day, and what mighty engineering works he did at home and abroad, and how he sleeps now in the hope of a joyful resurrection with the just made perfect. These present strangers can recall it for themselves; many strangers go up to look at it. His grave is as famous as the Ashendell itself, and I have known folks turn into the church-yard in their own eyes after reading the flourishing inscription: believing it all like good, pious, easy-how sad that so distinguished a man should have been cut off in the prime of his days. But I don't believe it. He was never any thing but a plain James Lawrence, and a young fellow who, as a lad, had peddled barn-legged over the country when first on a guide across the moors; who had been taken a fancy to by one of them, and decently educated; who had made the most of his luck, and done a decent day's work at his engineering; who had come back among us in all his glory, to dazzle most people's eyes, and break little Honor Livingston's heart. I'm one good thing I know of him was, that he pensioned his poor old mother; but he did not stop there near her, and never after Honor Livingston was dead—no, not even in her last illness. It was a marvel to every body what keeping him ever here, when we saw him the day before he was found dead; but it was his fate, and he couldn't keep away. I'm not in my view of it, that he died, and the manner of it, all Lawrence had its speculations, and how he died, but I think he died as he had my opinion, however, and I keep it. I have never seen reason to change it; but, on the contrary, I see every evidence to confirm it. I do not believe he either threw himself over the cliff, or fell over, or was pushed over; no, I believe he was drawn over—drawn over by something below. When you have heard the notes he made in a little book which was found among his things after he was dead, you will know what I mean. His cousin gave that book to me, knowing I am curious after the secrets of the human heart; and what I am going to read, is written in his hand. I know his hand well, and certify to it;

PASSAGES FROM JAMES LAWRENCE'S JOURNAL.

London.

Honor Livingston has kept her word with me. I saw her last night as plainly as I now see this pen I am writing with, and the sketch-book I have just dipped it into. I saw her standing betwixt me and the fire-light as long at me, exactly as I looked the last time I saw her alive. I was neither asleep, nor dreaming-awake. I had only drunk a couple of glasses of wine at dinner, and was as much my own man as ever I was in my life. It is all nonsense to talk about fancy and optical delusions in this case. I saw her with my eyes and touched at I ever saw her alive in the body. The halt clock that goes slowly and sadly, as it was growing daily exactly the time of evening, as I well remember, when she came creeping round by the cottage wall, and saw me through the open window, gathering up my books and making ready to go away from Ashendell. She was the last thought to have come into my mind at that moment, for I was glad on the point of lighting my cigar and going out for a stroll, before returning in at the Dolaise to chat with Anne. All at once there she was, Honor herself! I could have sworn it, had I not seen them with her arranged just a minute before, ago. I could not take my eyes off her; and there she stood, as nearly as I can tell, a minute—but it may be an hour—and then—and then—that she had filled was empty. I was so much bewildered, and out of myself as it were, that for a while I could neither think of any thing, nor hear any thing, but the most heavy throbbing of my own pulses. I do not say that I was frightened exactly; for the time I was completely rapt away; the first actual sensation I had was of my own heart thumping against my breast like a sledge-hammer.

But I can call her up now and analyze her—a wan, vague, misty outline, with features and eyes full upon me. I can almost fancy I hear her asking again, "Is it true you're going, James? You're not really going, James?"

"Now I am not the man to be frightened by a shadow, though that shadow be Honor herself, whom they say I as good as murdered. I always had a turn for investigating riddles, spiritual, physiological, and otherwise; and I mean to follow this mystery up, and note whether she comes back to me year by year, as she promised. I have never yet, during the several months before me, seen any one who cares to see spectres of himself at reasonable price. But his, talking to me of pains of his adventures and miseadventures out of yellow old pages that had better never have been written; but this is a marked event—most unmeaning, and a well-authenticated ghost-story to me who never believed in ghosts before.

"I am a rather spiteful threat of Honor—" I'll haunt you till you come to the Ashenfull, where I'm going now!" I might have stopped her, but it never entered my mind what she meant until it was done. I did not expect she would make a tragedy of a little love story; she did not look like that sort of thing. She was no ghost, bless her! in the flesh, but as sound, rosy, dimpled a little creature as one would wish to see; and what could possess her to throw herself over the fall, Heaven only knows. Well! Yes, I know that all no lies here, I need not do any false swearing to myself—the poor little creature loved me, and I wanted her to love me, and I petted and pleased her into loving me, because I was idle and had the opportunity; and then I had nothing better to tell her than that I was only in jest—I could not marry her, for I was engaged to another woman. She would not believe it. That sounded, to her, more like jest than the other. And she did not believe it until she saw me making ready to go; and then, all in a moment, I suppose, coolness seized her, and she pushed me away, where she went you will know.

I fancy I can see her now coming tripping down the fields from the little hamlet with her pail, and I fancy I can see the saucy laugh she gave me over her shoulder as I asked her if she had any ripe cherries left. She looked to me very much like with those pretty eyes, and I was taken rather aback when she said, "I know you, Jemmy Dalton, since." Then in the beginning of it, Little Honor and her mother lived next door to mine, and she had not been there above a week when she fell seven years away. I did not know her, the gipsy, but I must needs go in and see her that evening; and we went on until I asked her if she remembered when we went to dame-school together, and when she promised to be my little wife? If she remembered! Of course she did every word of it, and more; and she was so pretty, and the lanes in the summer were so lovely, and sometimes my fancy did play Anne Dalton false, and I believed I should like Honor better; and said more than I meant, and she took it all in the grave serious manner.

I was not much to blame. I would not have injured her for the world; she was as good a little soul as ever lived. Love and jealousy, as passions, seem to find their strength and nourishment in a child. Phillis, the milkmaid, is disappointed, she drowns herself in the mill-pool; if Lady Clara gets a crush of the blues she writes a lachrymose poem, and marries a gouty peer; if Colin's sweet-heart smiles on Lubin, Colin loads his gun and shoots them both; if Sir Harry's fair floats him, he tosses her down the wind, and goes a-wooing elsewhere. Had little Honor died in the night, she would be living still. Oh, the pretty demure lips, and the shy glances and rosy blushes! When I saw Anne Dalton to-day, I could not help comparing her fresh-gotten womanhood with Honor. Anne loves herself better than me, I'll swear love are you, Ann. But then I know she is the kind of wife to help a man up in the world, and that is the kind of wife for me.

Honor Livingston lying on her little bed, and her blind mother feeling her cold, dead face! I wish I had never seen it. I would have given the world to have had something remembered to her to go in and look at her; and I did feel then as if I had killed her. I had not the slightest notion or presence of this drowned Ophelia and of her lively self. She was like, yet unlike; but I knew it was Honor; and I think of the days of my youth, when ever her restless spirit may be condemned to bide between wilds—on the tenth of August she will always come back to me, and haunt me with a look of woe.

HARPTREE, August 11, 1859.

Again! I had forgotten the day—forgotten every thing about that wretched business of poor Honor Livingston last night I dreamed it.

Anne and I were sitting together out in the verranda, talking of all sorts of commonplace things —our neighbors, Mrs. Somers, Miss Bell, and the other—she was was looking beautiful, and I was on the point of proposing a row by moonlight on the Anne said, "How lovely the evening's are, James in this place! Look at the sky over the down, how clear it is!" Turning my head to the Mendip standing on the grass only a few paces off, my shadowy shape quite distinct against the reds and purples of the west.

Anne clutched my hand with a sudden cry, for she was looking at my face all the time, and guessed me passionately what I saw. With that Honor was gone, and, passing my hand over my eyes, I put my visit off with an excuse and went home, and in my heart. And, indeed, it was no lie to say so, for this visitation gave me a terrible shock.

Anne thought me ill, and I was ill, though I must be something dreadful, if not dangerous, that could make me look so in their eyes; you had an awful face, James, for a moment."

I begged her not to talk about it, assured her that it was a thing of very rare occurrence with me, and that there was no cure for it. But this did not pacify her, and this morning no peace could be had until Mr. Hutchinson was sent for and she had given the old gentleman her own account of me. He said a great deal of talk to me about it, but when he got me by myself, I can not tell how it was, but he absolutely contrived to worm the facts out of me, as if he had enough to do with them. He looked at me very oddly, with a sort of suspicious scrutiny in his eye; but I understood him, and said, haughtily, "No, doctor, you are wrong in nothing wrong here," tapping my forehead as I spoke.

"I should say every thing else but that," he says ghosts," replied he, dryly. But I perceived, at the time he was with me, that I was the object of a furtive and carefully dissembled observation, which was excessively trying. I could with difficulty keep my temper under it, and I believe he saw the struggle.

I fancy he wanted to have some talk with Anne by herself, but I prevented that by never being right of him until he was safely off the premises. He is prepared a private interview while I was out myself, I gather that, too, by inquiring after leaving Anne to pack up our traps, and coming back to town that very day. I have not been well myself, I feel out of spirits, bored, worried, sick of every thing. If the feeling does not leave me, in spite of all Anne may say, I shall take that offer to go to South America, and start by the next packet. I should like to see Dr. Hutchinson's face when he calls at our lodgings to visit his patient, and finds the bird flown.

LONDON, August 20, 1859.

This wretched state of things does not cease. One day I feel in full, firm, clear possession of my soul, and the next, perhaps, I am hurried to and fro with the most terrible fancies. I see shadows of Honor wherever I turn, and she is no longer motionless as before, but beckons me with her hand until I tremble in every limb. My heart is sick almost to death. For three days now I have had no rest. I can not sleep at nights for hideous dreams; and Anne watches me stealthily, I see, and never remains alone with me longer than she can help. Does the person think me afraid of her, and that she suspects something, without exactly knowing what. To-day she must needs suggest that seeing a physician might do me good. I replied that I was going to South America, she told me I was not fit for it, in such a contemptuous tone of provocation that I think it was meant to hurt her. Then she qualified, and while shrinking under my eyes, she said, "I assure you, I was not afraid of a mad man!" Since then I know she sits with me in silent terror, longing to escape and find some one to come to her assistance. I have had a pretty strict ward that she does nothing of the kind. I will not have my foes of my own household, and so spying servants and cross looks have to put asunder those whom God has joined together.

ALGARVO, March 17, 1861.

It is six months since I wrote a word. In the interval I have been miserably ill, grievously tormented both in mind and body; but now that I have got safely away from them all, with the Atlantic between myself and my wicked wife, whose contract toward me I have broken, I feel I can collect my powers of mind, and bend them again to my work. Burton came out in the same ship with me, and was in the same stateroom. For a few days' rest we intend settling out on our journey to the mining districts together—a rest I feel I shall both perfectly light and clear, all my impressions are distinct and vivid again, and I can get through a hard day's work without the slightest weariness. There was nothing but my miserable liver to blame, and when that was set right all my imaginary troubles disappeared. Dr. Langley Hutchinson had been coming on gradually for months, and was there ever a more complete example of my symptoms; my diseased state was one always so attended more or less. And Anne, in her overanxiety, had actually made me consult him. After a few days' rest we intend setting

"Pass the rude black man, who had handled an ear
The best on that terrible row of the few.
And ugly and grim in the midnight glare
Were his thick parched lips, and his dull small eyes,
And the tangled fleece of his rusty hair—
Ere the next of the brutishes the dank-bit draw,
His clean ills a sword pierced the silence through.

Let the play end with your Number Four.
What need we die?" Alex sprang low
Who have hope to save and have wives to cry
O'er the cradle of children first!
What matter if folk without home should die,
And be eaten by hate? Is not ours?
"I care for nobody; no, but I.
Since nobody cares for me!"

And with that, a knife—and a heart struck through—
And the warm red blood, and the cold black clay,
And the famine withdrawn from among the few,
By their horrible meal for another day!

So the night, thus fed, came at last to Intd,
And the tale of their shipmate told.
As of wood and of stone the burning mind,
Which braves not the thirsty, cold,
But the love of the listener, sob and free,
Goes forth to that slave on that terrible sea.

For, fancies from hearth and from home will stray,
Though night are the chaos and the song;
And a green tale told, if the tune be gay,
Says little to cure the young.
While they sing, with their voice clear as can be,
Having sailed, once more, for the blithe old glee—
"I care for nobody; no, no I,
Since nobody cares for me."

But the careless tune, it saith to the old,
Who sit by the hearth as red as gold,
When they think of their tale of that terrible sea:
"Believe in thy kind, whate'er the degree,
Be it King on his throne, or serf on his knee,
While our Lord above send from his bounty free,
Over storm, over calm, over land, over sea."

Mr. Purvis had so greatly disquieted the minds of the Gentlemen King Arthur for some minutes by snoring with strong symptoms of apoplexy—which, in a mild form, was his normal state of health—that it was now deemed expedient to wake him and entreat him to allow himself to be escorted home. Mr. Purvis's reply to this friendly suggestion could not be placed on record without the aid of several dashes, and is therefore omitted. It was conveyed in a spirit of the profoundest dissertation, and executed with vehemence, contempt, scorn, and disgust. There was nothing for it but to let the excellent gentleman alone, and he fell, without loss of time, into a defiant slumber.

The toasts being twirled again, we buzzed and bowed in the direction of the young fisherman, that Captain Jorgan advised him to be bright and prepare for a speech. But it startled not a single guest, late in its career, and fell before a well-looking boarded man (one who made working-drawings for machinery, the captain was informed, by his next neighbor), who promptly took it up, like a challenger's glove.

"Oswald Penreven!" said the chairman.

"How's Uncle'rin at last!" the captain whispered Alfred Haycroft. "Uncle'ria gos dawn shed right smart; don't he?"

He did, without one introductory word.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Burnett's Cocoaine.

This is an article which we can heartily recommend, and that from knowing its great virtues. In a particular case in our family of its efficacy we will mention. The person had suffered with a low fever, which was most tedious, and which left her with a terrible neuralgia in the head. The effect of these complaints was to cause much of the hair to fall off, and there seemed to be no power in the skin to give life to what remained. After she had tried some other preparations with no good results, we procured for her a bottle of Cocoaine, and the change which its use soon made was truly remarkable. The roots of the hair at once received new life, and before a bottle had been used the large spot upon the top of the head which appeared to be bald, was covered with what seemed a new growth of hair. And now she has as fine and healthy a head of hair as before her sickness. This Cocoaine is also a valuable article for children's hair, which is very apt to be dry. A very small quantity will keep their hair moist and their heads clean.

What we say of this article we say from our own actual knowledge, not for the sake of puffing the Cocoaine, but because we think others may be benefited by our experience.—Boston Christian Freeman.

THE PUBLISHERS of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE have made engagements which they are confident will render the Twenty-Second Volume, of which this is the second Number, more valuable and attractive than any which have preceded it.

The Article on "Washoe" in this Number is the second of a Series of Papers portraying Life and Character in California and Oregon, by J. ROSS BROWNE, late Confidential Commissioner to Japan for the Pacific States. They will be profusely illustrated with Drawings by STARNES, MCLENAN, CHAPIN, and PARSONS, from the Character Sketches by the Author.

In the February Number will appear the first part of a New Story by W. M. THACKERAY, which, it is expected, will be continued in successive numbers during the year.

Other Illustrated Papers, depicting Life, Character, and Scenery in every part of the American Continent, from Alaska to Cape Horn, are in course of preparation by Favorite Authors and Artists.

The Publishers trust that the thousands of Voluntary Correspondents by whom aid the Editors have been able to make the "Drawer" a marked feature of the Magazine, will continue their favors; and that new Correspondents will forward such anecdotes and facetiæ as come under their observation.
